make artificial dens, and distribute along the line, traps, stakes and sliding poles or wires, to be used when you begin operations.

Look over your traps and test by springing each one, to see if they are defective in any way. Examine the chains as well. As a rule, trap parts that are defective can be replaced, but it is much better to buy new traps. Under no circumstances use traps that are in poor working order. Traps cost only a few cents each, but furs are worth much more.

To kill any odor that may be on the traps and to give them a natural appearance hard to detect in any surrounding, and at the same time preventing rust, bury them, chains and all, for a couple of weeks in barnyard manure, or boil them in a pot of water, into which has been previously dumped and boiled a pail of walnut husks. For setting in snow, where the traps are needed to be as inconspicuous as possible, boil the traps in a paste made of lime and water, to the consistency of paint. After this treatment they should be hung up until wanted for use, in a place where they will be neither touched nor have a chance to get dirty again.

All the necessary outfit should now be assembled, and of this I might make special mention of the knife to be used. It is unnecessary to have an expensive knife or even a special knife; the main thing is that it should be of such material that it will take an edge and keep it. A sharp knife is the only kind to be used in skinning, for with it you cannot only do better work but make better time as well.

Animal baits or scents should be bought or made now. For the novice I would recommend that he buy a good scent, rather than attempt to make one, for often a good formula will secure good results when made by him, whereas good scent will increase his catch materially.

In trapping, work on a business scale as much as you possibly can. It does not pay to conduct any business in a slipshod manner; and trapping is a business reduced to an art or science by so much competition and the cunning of the animals.

Do not make the mistake of setting more traps than you can possibly attend to. One dozen traps well looked after and set will secure more fur than several dozen set and cared for in a hit-and-miss style. "More hurry less speed," is an old axiom that fits in well here.

Many trappers think that a locality some distance away would be much better than theirs, but usually they find, if they go there, it is not nearly so good.

Questions and Answers.

Miscellaneous.

Sick Ferret.

A ferret has a large lump on his jaw and is running water at the eyes. It seems rather difficult for him to breathe. What is the trouble? R. B.

Ans.—The symptoms indicate distemper. The throat should be poulticed. Maybe it will be necessary to lance.

Calf With Two Tails.

Where can I find a market for a calf with two tails? The calf is about four months old. J. A. F.

Ans.—We do not know that the butchers have any serious objection to buying a calf with two tails, provided it is in good flesh. Some might exhibit such a calf as a freak at some show and secure some revenue that way, but we do not know of anyone in the market for such at the present time.

Cow Fails to Breed.

Valuable cow had two calves but now fails to breed. The last calf was dropped in 1918, and there was a discharge for several months after. Cow comes in heat regularly. Can anything be done? I had the womb dilated. W. B. S.

Ans.—There is possibly some disease of the genital organs which might be successfully treated by a specialist in this line. This case is not an isolated one by any means. Many valuable animals become non-breeders through some genital trouble, which if taken in time and properly treated could be rectified. A veterinarian who understands the trouble might treat successfully for sterility.
