THE CROSS ROADS.
A SUPERNATURAL WARNING.

I was in a hurry to reach home. No wonder, for it was the wildest night I had ever known in all my life, and the country over which I took my way was bad as country roads in general. Consequently I was walking at a great rate, with the collar of my rough coat over my ears, and endeavoring to keep my feet in my path and caught me by the arm.

"Hullo!" said he, "you're just in time; you are wanted at the cross-roads to-night."

The voice was that of a ruffian. I fancied myself attacked by a highwayman. I stood quite still, and strove to answer him by my manner that I was able to protect myself.

"What the deuce am I wanted at the cross-roads for?" said I. "Unless I choose, I will be a very hard matter to get me there."

But instead of producing a pistol and demanding my money of my life, the man answered in an altered tone.

"Beg pardon, I made a mistake. I thought it was my brother, and I wanted to frighten him. Bad night, sir?"

"You don't know the time, sir?" he asked.

"It was seven when I left the train at L. I said."

"Good-night," said I.

If his object had been robbery, probably he had decided from my rough appearance that I was too poor a man to be worth the trouble. But after all, I thought, probably he spoke the truth. A man may have such a voice without being a highwayman, no doubt. So I went on my way, and soon found myself under shelter, and partaking of a warm and savory supper.

My mother was there and my brother Ben. Ben was a great strapping fellow for his age, and it came to wrestling or boxing, and as good a boy as ever lived. I lay down on my pillow, and though he had exercised his right to vote already in one presidential election, he was a good sleeper.
