Confinement is as irksome to the Stomach, fowls as to human beings, and whether fed well or not they will fail and Aids to give good results if shut up in close quarters during a long and tedious winter. Fowls are naturally full of activity, and delight in roaming over the fields in search of food, which not only affords exercise but makes them contented and puts them in the best possible condition

When the snow covers the ground the fowls are compelled to remain in their quarters because they are not adapted to locomotion in deep snows, and the gloomy days and dark quarters affect them the same as though they were prisoners within the walls of a building from which there is no escape. The hens do not lay because it is not the season of the year for producing their kind and because the conditions are not such as to promote egg production. The question comes up in regard to the poultry houses. As a rule they are too small. Notice a flock of hens that have an opportunity on a large barn floor on a cold winter day and it will not be difficult to observe that their actions are very different from Before Dorothy could get the their conduct in the small poaltry hooks wrapped up and make change house.
