Undertow Claimed
In Earth's Crust.

Further confirmation for the theory of a plastic substructure for the earth's crust was offered to geologists at the British Association recently by Reginald A. Daly, professor of geology at Harvard University, who delivered a paper in which he related the degree of plasticity of the earth's crust to the depth below the surface. During the glacial period, it seems vast masses of ice accumulated in the northern part of North America, two of the areas badly frozen being Keewatin and Labrador. The crust of the earth at these points tended to yield under the load, and to sink below the normal level, until the load of the crust was brought into equilibrium with the unloaded portions adjacent. When the ice was removed, the ground which it covered was at an abnormally low level, and proceeded to restore itself gradually to the horizontal.

"These regions have now readjusted themselves completely," the geologist said. "There is sufficient evidence to support the theory that an equally complete and perfect response to the gravitational forces took place, when the continent was weighted down with huge masses of ice." Dr. Daly pointed out that the subsidence under the ice load was accompanied by an elevation of the neighboring crust in a ring surrounding the loaded down area. To explain this phenomenon, he proposed the theory that the strength of the earth's crust decreases in zones, becoming less with increasing depth. This gave rise to an undertow below the depressed territories, which pushed out the substructure from beneath the sinking lands, and accordingly elevated the surface just beyond the edge of the glaciated region.

"This viscous flow had greatest effect at great depths," Prof. Daly stated. The downward pressure of the piled up ice was communicated through the soft layers of the earth to the country beyond, in the light of this theory, according to the principle of the mechanism used to control the steering engines of large steamers from the pilot house, in which the motion is transmitted by oil enclosed in steel pipes.

Aeroplane

London, Sept. (By Canadian Press).

—The first official flight of an aeroplane of 1,000 horsepower, the largest single-engine machine yet devised, took place recently at Brough. The machine and its initial flight are thus described in the Times by the aeronautical correspondent of the Thunderer:

"The Blackburn-Napier Cubaroo, the largest single-engine aeroplane in the world, built specially to utilize the full power of the 1,000-horsepower Napier Cub engine, in itself the highest-powered aero engine in existence, is designed to be either a torpedo or bomb carrier of exceptionally long range in point of duration, and may fairly be said to represent a notable achievement in British aviation."

"It is the result of the aircraft skill of the Blackburn Aeroplane Co., whose works are situated here on the edge of the Humber, and the long experience of internal combustion engines possessed by Messrs. D. Napier & Son, and its flight has been awaited with considerable interest, not only in British air circles, but in many foreign countries. As the machine has been built to the order of the Air Ministry for service purposes, it is not permissible to refer in detail either to the performance of the machine, which in itself is noteworthy, or to all the interesting features of all the internal arrangements, but it may be stated that the gross weight of the Napier Cub has to take through the air is over nine tons, and that the carrying capacity is approximately three tons."

The span of the machine, which positively towers above one when standing on the ground, is 88 ft. and despite its size, the wings are so arranged that they can be folded back for storage. The length is 54 ft. and the overall height is slightly more than 19 ft.

"The machine is the product of Major Bumpus, the chief designer of the Blackburn Aeroplane Company, who has already an exceedingly useful deck landing torpedo plane (now in, extensive use in the Service) to his credit, and it utilizes the special triangular form of steel fuselage construction which is a feature of Blackburn productions."

"If the machine were impressive, its actual flight was even more so, and despite its size it obviously was handled as easily as a scout. Its pilot, Flight-Lieut. W. S. Bulman, certainly did many of the things one associates with a small machine, such as: throttling down close to the ground, flying directly toward a group of cinema operators on a mound, and then opening out on a climbing turn over their heads."

"At one time it looked as if low clouds and heavy rain would prevent the flight, but at 4 o'clock a watery sun broke through the clouds and the internal self-starter was at once set to work to charge up the big engine. Once the Cub got going it genially grumbled to itself in a deep-throated rumble during the preliminary warming-up process, and then the pilot, a tiny figure it seemed, perched high up in the fuselage, 'taxied' over to the far side of the aerodrome, turned, and at once opened up the engine."

"With a powerful roar the Napier Cub lifted the machine into the air after a run of less than 200 yards. Then followed over 20 minutes' delightful flying, and though one never lost the impression of the size of the machine, or the spread of its silver-colored wings, the ease with which it turned, banked and climbed over and around the sheds on the aerodrome, and the smallness of the circle in which it manoeuvred, suggested more the control of a single-seater sport than that of a machine weighing tons."

"The landing was the most perfect it has been one's pleasure to see for a long time; the huge machine glided slowly down to earth, and without any perceptible moment of contact with the ground sank on to the oleo gear of its double undercarriage and came to rest in a very short run."

Members of Parliament

ENGAGED IN TREASURE QUEST.

London, Sept.—(Canadian Press).—

The British House of Commons is engaged in a treasure quest. It is believed that somewhere there are to be found, perhaps on the Continent or in America, if not in this country, three ivory statues of the 17th century, which open and display beautifully carved scenes of stirring incidents in British history.

There have already been discovered two of Charles the First and one of Oliver Cromwell, which are now in the possession of the House; but the original set, it is thought, consisted of six. A fourth, in fact, has already been traced. It is a Mary Queen of Scots, the skirt opening back to reveal a carved scene of the death of Rizzio. Though it has been stated that it was bought for £30 in Meran by an American some time ago, there is reason to believe it is in this country, and that there is a prospect of the House having an opportunity to acquire it.

Of the subjects of the others of the set there is no very definite information, but so novel is the idea in the carving—the historic scene within the body of the figure—that members of the House who are devoting their holidays a little time to the quest cannot fail to identify the little treasures if by some lucky chance they should come across them.

The first was found some six years ago by Sir Clive Morrison-Bell in a shop at Geneva. It was a Charles the First, standing in full Cavalier costume, with the left hand resting on the belt which holds the sword. The whole of the body of the figure opens in the centre and reveals in three parts what is described on the tablet that rests on the thighs, "Disolution au Parlement par Oliver Cromwell." The central scene, with its 10 or a dozen little figures, depicts the moment when Cromwell is thundering "Take away that Bauble." In the left hand panel are soldiers entering the House, and in the right hand members being expelled. The head of Charles, like a rock above a climber, overhangs the opened scene.

Another Charles and an Oliver Cromwell with a scene of the Battle of Naseby have been presented more recently by Sir William Bull and W. R. Rea. They have not yet been shown, but will shortly be placed in glass cases with the first Charles in the library.
