Turning to the cause of the scare, "Custos" states that the reasons were threefold. The first was an article in Vanity Fair, which the German Government considered to be "inspired"; and the second, another article in the Army and Navy Gazette, which appears to have been regarded as equivalent to the German official service or-ABOUT TO WAR ON BRITAIN gan, which, of course, it is not. The Army and Navy Gazette article was generally regarded as heralding war. Then came the climax-the redistribu-tion of the British navy. "This very natural and wise step was immediately construed in Berlin as denoting the preliminary steps to hostilities. The withdrawal of four ships from the Mediterranean, it was thought, could signify nothing else than that England desired to concentrate an overwhelming force near Germany in order to pounce down upor the inferior German fleet and effect its
