Smith and Hall Convicted of Passing a Confederate Bill Lightly

The Aheren trial was continued in the Assize court yesterday morning at half-past ten o'clock. There were only two witnesses left to examine, Edward Lines and the ac-

Edward Lines, about 3 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon, was in the hallway of the Trade Dollar and saw Josie Edwards stowing away a roll of bills in her stocking. Hussey was at that time lying on the lounge in the wine room.

Joseph Aheren, the accused, was then sworn; he had left 127 Johnson street about sworn; he had left 127 Johnson street about 6 o'clock that morning, had met Hussey and the girl near the Trade Dollar, and at their request for a drink opened the saloon. Witness left about 7 o'clock, went back there about 3 o'clock in the afternoon; the girl and Hussey were there and were noisy, and witness feeling "leery" because his license had not yet been transferred to him told the bartender to order them out. Had given proper change for the bills paid him for drinks; his conversation with Josey when he spoke of her leaving town after the money was lost was for the purpose of finding out whether she knew anything about the money.

Mr. Belyea in his address to the jury held that there was no evidence to show that Aberen could be connected with taking the money at all.

Mr. Irving, for the Crown, in going over the evidence stated that it looked very strange that the bartender had not been brought as a witness for the defence. Then what possible motive could accused have had for trying to get Josey Edwards out of the country except to cover up tracks?

country except to cover up tracks?

His Lordship in summing up said that this case represented one of the dark sides of Victoria life. Among the witnesses were a number of men who had stood around in a saloon and took drinks, perfectly careless as to whether the money paid over the bar to whether the money paid over the bar was the price of a woman's infamy. What the jury had to find was whether the prisoner took money from Hussey and did not give back the proper change. By the code, stealing included a case where money having been paid over the accused declined or refused or neglected to hand back the proper change.

He hoped also that in the case of Hall the court would take into consideration the time he had already been in prison since his arrest. He also reminded the court of the jury's strong recommendation to mercy.

His Lordship in delivering sentence said that he considered Smith mainly liable for the offence. He was the one who had the note and had induced Hall to pass it. It was hardly the reckless act of an imprudent youth, but a deliberate plan to pass the bill. The sentence of the court was three months' imprisonment in each case,
