MAKING OVER CHRISTMAS

By CHALL PANOAST.

"Certainly," he replied. "I shall take the love torn and weak-hearted young man in hand and advise him to buy work baskets, sewing outfits and kitchen utensils, instead of the customary celluloid album and plush toilet cases. Instead of very foolishly squandering their money on cigarette cases, collar buttons, boxes of two-for cigars, new-worn neckties, and new-used clothes brushes, the young ladies will be advised to buy articles for the home. In this way their money is just invested, because they will get it back again—or some other girl will; they, in turn, will get the gifts of some other dear girl, so there will be an equal exchange that will be profitable all around."

So the Schemester and his wife argued and he and she until all arrangements were completed for organizing the Yuletide game of Give and Take. Owing to the probability of a riotous and a possible conflict with the local merchants, who were fighting the mail-order dealers, Dan preferred to keep his name in the background, and he created a post office box, opened up a secret office in an abandoned building, and began his reform movement against the customary methods of Christmas shopping. His letter took effect immediately and he was kept busier than a one-eyed man at a Wild West Show. He wrote long letters with orders, by buying direct from a large wholesale house he found he could fill them at a colossal profit.

Everything seemed to go smoothly except the part of getting the people to answer the letter in which he asked them what they wanted for Christmas. Even his request that this information be furnished for the good of the country would not pull the secret from their breasts.

THE BUMP OF BENEVOLENCE. Gyer—"Isn't it queer that the bump of benevolence is located exactly at the top of a man's head?"

MYER—"What's queer about it?" Gyer—"Why, it's as far from the pocketbook as possible."

AN ADVANTAGE. "You—Hank Hicks—y're always blawin' 'bout how much ye kin drink. I'll just bet ye ten cents I've drank more liquor in my life 'n you have."

to buy for their friends. When the Schemester entered into this public service of selecting the gifts to be exchanged at Yuletide, he had no idea that being filled with the generous spirit of a Christmas-buyer and as he was spending someone else's money, he made rapid progress in his work.

In the bustle and mad rush of selecting presents and filling orders, it was no easy matter to remember who was the giver and who the receiver of any particular gift. But Dan had ideas of the systematic filing of information and data. So he arranged cards alphabetically, on which were placed together the name of the person sending the present and the person to whom it was to be sent.

Thus under the index of "B," for instance, might be found a card on which was written the name "Mr. J. B. Billings" and filed immediately behind it was a card on which appeared "Lucy Williams," his sweetheart. On one card was her name, on another was her address, and on still another card the gift she was to receive. It was a most complicated system, but upon the happiness and joy of Christmas, the miscellaneous department of all the happiness placed on one card would be the placing of a card under the name of a person to whom the gift was to be sent.

The walls of the office, now turned into a store-room for gifts, were covered with three-sheet-poster lists of articles for ladies, gentlemen, babies, and children. Gifts for boys, girls, dogs, cats, and Teddy bears; suggestions for the home, the table, the barn, and the best room. The Schemester used these lists as a guide, and in writing suggestions, he merely had to look around the walls and select at random. He had planned to inoculate the Christmas shopping because, in writing suggestions, he merely had to look around the walls and select at random.

The Schemester slipped quietly about the office, and his office-furniture, when he came to the card-files, he stopped short and looked longingly at the system which had made the letters of his heart. It was such a wonderfully complete method of keeping track of giver and receiver, it was such a wonderfully complete method of keeping track of giver and receiver, it was such a wonderfully complete method of keeping track of giver and receiver.

Together they stole softly down the back stairs and each struck off in different ways. When Dan emerged upon the main street he found his fellow citizens hurrying about with their arms and their hands and their feet.

He met Billy Wilkenson, the postmaster, rushing madly along the street. "Merry Christmas," greeted Dan.

"Merry nothing," yelled Wilkenson. "Merry Fool! Is that what I call it. Here look at these, and he rammed a green silk petticoat and two white celluloid side-combs into Dan's arms.
