WILLOWES, EDMOND. The son or grandson of a glass-painter at Shottsford Forum. He ran away with Barbara Grebe (q.v.).

"He was, indeed, one of the handsomest men who ever set his lips on a maid's. A blue coat, murrey waistcoat, and breeches of drab set off a figure that could scarcely be surpassed. He had large dark eyes."

He was so frightfully disfigured by a burning accident that Barbara shrank away from him in terror. He went abroad again in order to give his wife time to recover from the shock, and after some years' silence she learned that he had died some six months after leaving her. Mentioned in D. 2.

WILLS, BILLY. A Casterbridge glazier and a frequenter of the Three Mariners Inn. Mentioned in C. vi.

WILLS, Sergeant-Major. A comrade of John Loveday. See M. xli.

WINCHESTER GAOL. The scene of the execution of Tess for killing Alec D'Urberville. Mentioned in T. lix.

WINDWHISTLE. An inn of considerable repute which stands on the highest point of the road from Chard to Crewkerne, about equidistant between the two places. Famous for the view. TL. "A Tramp-woman's Tragedy."

WINDY BEAK. A prominent cliff at Endelstow. It was here that Elfride rode with Stephen Smith. In B. vii, xxxi.

WINGREEN HILL. TL. "The Vampirine Fair."

WINTERBORNE, GILES. A young man living at Little Hintock and engaged in the apple and cider trade. He was in love with Grace Melbery, and her father was at one time anxious that she should marry him, but when Grace became acquainted with Mrs. Charrmond and Dr. Fitzpiers he had higher views about her future. When Giles lost his property in Little
