Thus, according to Father Andre, who ought to know, the principal claims of the half-breeds had been settled before Riel's arrival, and the others were in a fair way of being so. But, as we have already charged, there is little doubt that Riel's visit.

On that condition, Father Andre said, Riel stated he would leave the country. This happened at one interview. At another, Riel renewed the subject and begged of Father Andre to use his influence with the Dominion Government to obtain the $35,000. "Use all the influence you can," implored Riel, "you may not get all that, but get all you can, and if you get less we will see." Father Andre put the question to him: "Even suppose the Government give you the $35,000, the half-breed question will remain the same." Riel replied, "If I am satisfied, the half-breed question will remain the same." Riel replied, "If I am satisfied, the half-breed question had to do with last spring's rebellion. Health declined, and the patients in the hospital suffered by being placed in charge of necessarily inexperienced nurses, and too few of them, rather than the authorities would accept the voluntary offer of the free services of manuary offer of the free services of manuary offer of the free services of the state of the case conquered prejudice, and the authorities were compelled to request the services of the Sisters, the volunteer offer of which they had previously rejected. The Sisters did not stand on their dignity as they might have done. They immediately responded, took charge of the small pox hospital, revolutionized its internal management, and have been so successful and given such universal satisfaction that the authorities now telegraph to Quebec for the services of two additional members of the Sisterhood. This is a striking comment on the early refusal of their services. It was only a few years ago that Charlottetown had no public hospital.
