On December 22 lava from Kliauea forced its way up through the floor of the Kau Desert, six miles distant from the fire pit of the crater, and by New Year's Day observers were watching a flow of molten lava, six miles long and 190 yards wide, traveling southward through the forest of ohia trees at a rate of three miles per day. The location of Kilauea's most recent outbreak is along the rift-line of 1868, left by the terrific earthquakes which rocked the Island of Hawaii in that year. The rift, clearly defined, runs from the southern rim of Halemaumau, the "house of fire," or firepit of Kilauea, through the south wall of the main crater and thence to the sea, twenty miles away, in a series of wide, parallel crevasses. The new flow, however, has not made its appearance along the rift at a point closer to the firepit than six miles, where it has welled up through the thickly lava-coated desert through the thickly lava-coated desert floor of Kau.

Molten Fountains. Molten Fountains.

From the rift-line many molten fountains could be seen spouting thirty feet in the air. Heavy fumes were emanating from the earth along the entire line of the rift.

Kilauea's latest outbreak is the culmination of a long period of tremendous activity, caused, says the volcano observers, by underground pressure of servers, by underground pressure of lava, which was not relieved by the recent discharges from the crater

As the desert flow increased, the lava level in Halemaumau continued to sink, until vulcanologists prophesied that the pit might be drained.

Vienna, Feb. 10.—The authorities recently authorized the population to cut and take from the municipal forests that surround Vienna as much wood as could be borne on the back three times weekly. The influx of new immigrants has prompted a proposal by Dr. Juan Carlos Garay, professor of law in the University of Buenos Aires, to propose enactment of a law making naturalization obligatory without renunciation of citizenship in the country of birth.
