There have not been wanting for several days bast indications of a collapse of the market. Its movements have been laggard, and halting, buying has lost its vim. Money has become tighter and in this respect there are no present hopes of better conditions. The word seems to have gone round that it is a good time to realize. Each day tendency in this direction shows more strongly. To day the tide was turned and the downward. To day the tide was turned and the downward to the conditions. The investment transactions of the conditions of the conditions of the conditions of the conditions. ALEXANDER & FERGUSSON tendency in this direction show and the downward movement began. The investment transactions are becoming lighter and the outsider is gradually disappearing. Whatever money there may be in foreign markets will find more satisfactory employment in moving cotton and wheat throughout Europe from now on than in the purchase of stocks of uncertain and finctuating value. The bank statement shows a decline in the amount of surplus reserve which will soon exhaust it, and money for speculative purposes is becoming difficult to secure. That element will become hereafter less and less a factor in the exchange, and with its departure there will be little left of the market. Prices have now reached a standard beyond which they cannot wen go in the absence of any strong incitement, and this fact is well appreciated by the professionals. No inducement presents itself to corporations seeking investment at present prices, and their action withdraws from the operations of the market so large a factor as to deprive it of the power of absorbing the numerous offers. The natural disposition of stocks to fall when unsustained by a strong purchasing influence will be made more evident with the approach of conditions becoming more stringent from week to week.
