

detail later in this report, it bears noting that participants seemed quite detached in discussing Canadian security, apparently because they could not imagine Canada being involved in anything but a global war, which in turn seemed to imply one quick nuclear battle, and hence a certain futility in conventional defensive preparedness.