

pressure to bear upon citizens to take light and power; not only that, but it is assuming to sell it at cost, and the Street Railway capital was not invested with a view of supplying any commodity purely at cost. Another handicap the company labors under is it has to pay very heavy taxes in respect of its light and power business, as well as other departments.

Gentlemen, that represents very shortly some of the views that may be presented upon the jitney question. I think they are well worth serious consideration. I must extend to you my hearty thanks for the opportunity of discussing them before you. Unfortunately, I am not capable of discussing it perhaps as fully and as technically as might be desirable, but the remarks that I have made, I have no doubt, will start you thinking upon the right line, and the solution of this question will be properly achieved, and achieved in such a way as to benefit the whole community.
