as it could bawl, which made the unlucky animal leave as it was.

Soon after the father and mother came home, and seeing the child in the same plight the ape had left it, were as much amazed as if they had dropt from the clouds. The father however, who had more sense than the mother, immediately concluded that it was the ape's doings, and could not refrain from laughter; but the mother taking the thing seriously, was for having the ape killed without delay for fear it would do some worse trick another time. The husband however, would not conform to this; and the ape lived to play many stranger pranks, as will appear by and bye.

One day the people of the house being gone to take a walk, the ape took a frolic to untie itself, and shave the cat, as he had seen a barber shave a gentleman that lived in the house. In order to effect this he tied the paws of the cat to the arms of a chair with strings which he took from the child's cradle; then he went and took a dirty dishcloth, which he found in the kitchen, and put it about the cat's neck; then he took a dishful of blackball, and throwing a little water upon it, went to wash the face of the cat which set up a terrible howling, whilst the ape washed it to such a purpose, that nothing appeared but the eyes: that done he clipped her beard with a pair of bad scissars, which he found on the table: then he began to play a thousand gambols about the room, o-
