Wherever the guests wandered, in the house or the to amuse them. Here were fountains and grottoes; here a cave with a gypsey who told fortunes; here a theatrical booth, with a dramatic performance by really good actors and other attractions, which required seeking out, being placed in out-ofthe-way nooks and corners. It was certainly open to the objection that t resembled a public more than a private entertainment, but the guests were not uncharitable enough to pause and discuss the point; they accepted their host's hospitality as freely as it was offered, and entered into the spirit of the affair with thorough enjoyment. Lady Barebones was critical and affable; she saw that such an entertainment could not be given by any but a gentleman of means, and having settled that a certain event was to occur in her family before the day was over, was in a state of high satisfaction. She instructed her eldest joy how to behave; told her she was to hold off just a little, but not sufficiently to jeopardize the proposal HAS OPENED HIS NEWBUILDING, which Mr. Armstrong intended to 'It is in point of birth a misalli-

To the consummation of this important event Lady Barebones devoted her fiercest energies, and she was forever on the trail of Mr. Armstrong, telling her daughter to look interesting, and now to stand here. and now to stand there, and wait for the impatient lover to declare himself. It had been her daughters' misfortune that their mother would not allow matters to take their regular course, but would insist upon flinging them at the men's heads. And the men wouldn't stand it; she had become a laughing-stock. The girls might have married fairly well but for their mother's cleverness. All the men saw through her. Certain bachelors who were in the habit of amusing themselves by observing her manœuvres, laughingly said to one another that Mr. Armstrong would have to take care, or he would be married before he knew where he
