

increased circulation of the Scriptures, they appeal with equal earnestness to nearer friends, to redouble their exertions in furnishing the Society with the means of going on in a continually widening sphere of usefulness, 'till it has arrived at the consummation of having so fully supplied every want at home, that it may be enabled to contribute towards the diffusion of Scripture light abroad, over the millions that yet sit in darkness. And may He in whose hand are the hearts of all men, inspire with increasing sincerity and zeal those who are already engaged in the work, and add daily to their number; hastening the promised day when there shall no longer be need of mutual exhortation to do the will and work of God; when "they shall no more teach every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord, for they shall all know him from the least of them, even unto the greatest of them."—Thus saith the Lord, and His word shall not pass away.
