THE MODERN NEWSPAPER.

A Series of Random Observations by an Acute Observer.

In all lines of endeavor during these evening years of the nineteenth century there have been numerous discoveries and inventions, but doubtless the advancements in the printing business have been the most noteworthy. A dozen years ago printers had the idea of the type-setting machines supplanting the most of them, but lately they have marveled that someone didn't invent the price of paper and of composition.

CAUSES OF FAILURE.

Every now and then we come upon a business failure for which there is apparently no particular reason. The insolvent is an honest, steady-going man, who has done his best, and yet he has a drawback that appears sufficient to cause failure. He does what is apparently a good thing, but he has a fatal flaw in his character.
