"When you start in to talk about bea unters," said George Sobers of Northum-erland county, Pa., "you want to wait ntil you hear about my brother Adam teyou talk too much. I've heard of good many bear hunters, but I've yet to ar of any one that I'd let Ad get in a back seat for. I'll remember just one of his hunts for you, to show you something of the stuff he is made of.

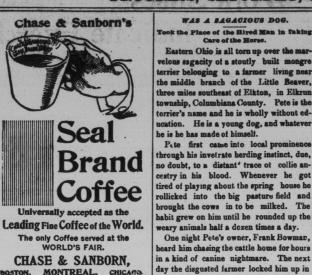

"He was out one day, near the head of Baker Run, and struck the trail of a big bear in the new snow. He followed it a nile or so and came to where another bear had joined the trail. That suited Ad, and he kept on. He had gone maybe another mile or so when a third bear chippedin and went along with the other two. This just tickled Ad to death.

"It was Monday. Ad kept along on the heels of those three bears, but hadn't got near enough to 'em to see the color of 'em when night came. He had followed the trail all day, and it had led him from swamp to swamp and from ridge to ridge for a good thirty miles. The eggravating part of the matter was that it had turned and twisted and wriggled about so that Ad was within in a mile of where he had just struck the trial of the single bear in the morning, and not more than two miles from his home, where he knew a supper t for a king and a nice warm bed were waiting for him. But Ad just camped right on the trail, and was on it again at the first streak of light.

"That day he followed the bears whereever they led, and a bear in that country has the choice of about the worst lot of country to get over there is in this State, and these bears chose the worst of the lot. When night came along Tuesday Ad had travelled a good forty miles, and was twenty miles from home, and, as far as signs went, was no nearer to the bears than he was when he started after ihem Monday morning. But he was just get ting warmed up to his work. He camped on the trail again and on Wednesday morning was up betree the sun and out on the trail again. Now, the result of that day's chase would have been apt to make one rearing, tearing mad. Ad hadn't seen anything more of the bears than the end-less stresk of tracks they made in the snow. and at night he was only a mile from home ! But Ad seemed to think it was all right, for he never asid a word but camp-ed right where he stopped, and was away sgain at dawn for a tourth day's tramp after the bears. He had travelled now more than ninety miles, but that wasn't discouraging to Ad. He'd he tollowing those bears yet it he hadn't come up to e n betore. When night came along Tuesday Ad had

"Ad hoped to come up with the wounded bear at least before night, and put it out of the need of further tramping, but he didn't, and had to camp . new more on the trail. Bright and early he was up on Fri-day, and two hours later he had the satis-faction of knowing that all three of the bears, the wounded one still bleeding, had taken reluge in a swamp, and the very swamp out of which the first bear had start-ed on Monday. "Ad entered the swamp and soon came upon the wounded bear lying in a sheltered place behind a clump of laurels. He put a ball through the bear's head and went on atter its companions. He tound them both on the edge of the swamp and knocked one of them ever at the first shot. The re-maining bear got out and led Ad a chase of five miles, where it entered another swamp and was still there. Ad routed the old tellew out and wounded him. The bear was tred running, and showed fight. He came at Ad like a cyclone, but met two Winchester bullets on the way and quit. Four days and a half Ad had chased those bears, and was three times in sight of his own house, turk he wouldn't give pp. He in so young a dog. This incident turnished the key to Pete's subsequent development. All last summer he was allowed to sleep in the harmock on the front porch. A strap tacked to the door post hung within reach, and whenever he grew resiless he would seize it and swing himself to and fro. When returning trom market one day, ambling quietly be neath the larmer's wagon, he espied two small children "playing horse" with a leather strap in the roadway. An hour later, when the farmer's bired boy hasten-ed back to ascertain his whereabours he was seen marching grimly up the road, having in tow the luckless juveniles wto had played the horse. This escapade ser-iously annoyed Mr. Bownan. Pete's temporary disgrace was forgotten, however, when harvesting begar. His owner had a big McCornick reaper and bincer, which tied the bundles of weat with a neat cord. The old strap instinct reasserted itself at once, and Pete began to seize the bundles as fast as they were thown off by the machine, and drag them out of its reach on the succ. eding circuit of the field. The bundles were a little heavy for him, but, as the wheat straw was unusually short last summer, he continued to make out. There is a handsome fountain in the town house of Cornelius Vanderbilt, and nother at the Breakers, Newport. The Newport fountain is underneath the grand staircase. It is round and very large.
