

ing his apparent sternness and coldness toward the world he conceived had used him so harshly, beneath the surface of his character there ran a vein of better feeling ; and that to those in whom he could intimately confide, he expressed the deepest regret and repentance for some of the acts of his life.

He had chosen his resting-place on the prominence himself had named " Point Gibraltar," where he sleeps alone ; the spot having been designated by a simple birch tree, which, however was unfortunately cut down by mistake. Many feel that justice has not been done to his memory, and that he possessed inherent qualities which, under better influences and happier auspices, would have developed into a character of no ordinary virtue ; his prominent faults being but perversions of a better moral sense ; and, that all being considered, it merits other treatment than silence and neglect.

Let the veil of oblivion be drawn over his faults, for " the grave covers all defects."

REUBEN GARLICK.

The Rev. Reuben Garlick, M.D., of English parentage, is said to have come from Milford, Massachusetts, but whether that was his native place, the writer has not learned ; the knowledge we have of him, before his coming to this country, having been principally drawn from the following extract of a letter addressed to the husband of his grand-daughter in West Shefford, in answer to inquiries respecting his earlier life.
