

time of the Great War, will all feel that in the death of Sir Henry Thornton they have lost a true friend. To each in turn, Sir Henry rendered an enduring service, and to all he was a kindly interpreter of interests held in common and a promoter of those understandings between peoples which make so strongly for international amity and good-will. The world in times like the present can ill afford the loss of one whose heart and mind were so keenly alive to its problems and to its needs.
