Moskovski Bolshevik May 8th contains article by V. Linetski entitled "Fascist Empire Ring of Universal Hatred". Red Army successes had been great stimulus to the struggle of the oppressed European nations and Germany's rear had become a furnace of hatred. The resistance movement had upset the theory of abstention from the conflict and unnecessary losses upheld by international reactionary circles. Resistances were described in Yugoslavia, France, Denmark and Belgium where the movement benefited from the example of Russian partisans. The National Army of Liberation in Yugoslavia and the Greek Elás were holding German divisions and weakening the defence of the European fortress. Explosive material in the West would make itself felt with the first blow from the sea. The Anglo-American invasion forces would meet experienced warriors schooled in the bitter struggle with the Fascists. Germans were exhibiting anxiety at the growing French resistance which they described as "a real menace". The power of Fascist Germany had been undermined and the Garrisons in the West were weakening. Transfers of German divisions Eastwards were creating favourable conditions for blows against the European fortress from the sea and from the French resistance movement.
