

THE HEATHEN CHINK.

Mongolian Opium dens in New York.

Shocking Scenes in the Sixth Ward's Chinese Quarter.

A Popular Eruption Against Opium in Industry Where Victims Abound.

Down in the gloomy opium cellars and up in the faded parlor of Mott street there was fear and trembling. The uprising of the residents of the Sixth Ward to protect the little girls of the tenement house districts from the horrible traps of Chinatown shook the very heart of the Oriental colony, and still the evil was not wholly abated. The facts ascertained about the modus operandi by which scores of girls have been lured to physical and moral ruin are startling in the extreme. In one den in Pell street, which is kept by an old hag of the most depraved type, there have been girls of from 10 to 30 years of age ruined. In a murky back room, up a still steeper flight of stairs, is the den, while the front room serves as a sort of parlor. Here it is that little girls are induced to first taste the little drug which is intended to pave the way to worse sin. The victim is COAXED UNTIL BY some one who knows her, and once in among the beggars, datterly young wretches who have already been wrecked, they are induced to try a pipe of opium. The delights of the trances are described and the girl tries out of curiosity. Her first few pipes are smoked in a cautious way, with every one looking on and urging. Then a young Chinaman, who knows how to roll the opium and fix the pipe, is introduced as a companion. As soon as the girl has become addicted to the opium habit her ruin is easily accomplished. And thus it is that the mournful wretches of Pell street and waste away their young lives, hapless victims of the Chinese denizens and their customers.

A painful incident in the movement against these dens occurred when one of the members of the Catholic Young Men's Association of Transfiguration parish caused the arrest of his own sister on a charge of disolute conduct. She was a girl of 13 years, just budding into womanhood. Her brother said that she associated with the abandoned woman who frequented the opium dens, and was fast becoming a victim to

THE VIEW OF MOTT STREET. The girl was taken to the Elizabeth street station-house and was locked up. The Father Barry said that she associated with the abandoned woman who frequented the opium dens, and was fast becoming a victim to

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

SCHOOL TRUSTEE PATRICK H. McDONALD, who is one of the committee appointed by the Catholic Young Men's Association to uproot the evils of Chinatown, said that his residence was opposite to No. 17 Pell street and that he knew personally many of the little girls who smoked opium in the Chinese dens. "Why," said he, "I have only to look out of my window and into the windows of the houses across the street to see sights that are actually blood-curdling. These Chinese dens are the most dangerous places for young girls in the city, and the opium habit they employ in recruiting girls is shocking in its evil results. I am a father myself, and I would not make charges lightly, but one-half of the terrible iniquity of Chinatown has not been exposed." It is said that the revelations of Emma Pool, a young woman who came from the Tomba police court some time ago, that she was a confirmed opium smoker, are being investigated by the Society for the Prevention of Crime. She gave the names of a number of children, who, she said, were regular habitués of Chinese dens, and claimed that she had seen little girls doled with opium candy by Mott street Chinamen in order that they might acquire a taste for the drug, thus becoming easy victims to worse crimes.—N. Y. Herald.

and his associates in any way possible, and even police detectives volunteered their services. To every body the girl replied that he would be thankful for any help, and that the movement was simply intended to rescue the scores of little girls who were in the clutches of the Chinese opium shop-keepers, and to

ADDRESS TO HON. JOHN COSTIGAN. A Tribute From His Fellow-Countrymen. The following address has recently been forwarded to the Hon. Mr. Costigan:— To the Hon. John Costigan, P.C., Minister of Inland Revenue, Ottawa. Sir,—We, the undersigned Irishmen, a few of your many admirers in and around the counties of Richmond and Drummond, P.Q., desire to express our approval of your political course, as well as our high esteem for your character as a citizen and gentleman, and especially our sincere and profound appreciation of your efforts and services on behalf of Ireland and Irishmen in general. We avail ourselves with pleasure of this occasion to express to you our gratitude for the signal service you have rendered to Ireland's national cause at the last session of Parliament by the judicious framing, timely introduction and triumphant passage of those famous and ever memorable "Irish Resolutions" of sympathy for Ireland's sufferings, and their friendly and well-timed advice directed towards the amelioration of her wrongs by the re-establishment of her just, constitutional and inalienable rights. It is well for Ireland and her cause that, while her most eminent and efficient sons are engaged in a tremendous struggle on her enanguined soil, against injustice, prejudice, and tyrannical legislation, their hands are being strengthened and their efforts efficiently seconded by their loyal fellow-countrymen and co-religionists in every corner and section of the New World. Whilst the whole Continent, from Hudson's Bay to the Gulf of Mexico, pours forth pecuniary aid from rich and poor, from cabin, cottage, hut and hall, thousands of uninitiated emigrants throughout the length and breadth of this great land, sustained by the intellect, patriotism, and education of Ireland's expatriated sons, by lecture and editorial pen, in pulpits and legislative hall, testify to the undying enmity of Ireland's remotest sons to injustice and oppression, as they testify to the depth and sincerity of their efforts and demands for the removal of existing wrongs, and for the national recognition of Ireland. Over and above the allegiance due to our religion and our adopted country, the next highest duty is imposed by patriotism—devotion to our native land, a land of which the greatest and best of us may well be proud. Ireland is not only our father-land which we honor, it is also the cradle and purest fountain of our religion which we revere and cherish; unless we desire to be reduced to the condition of the Jews, outcasts and wanderers without a national retreat, our only course is to be united in defence of our native land. We should repudiate and disavow all political ties and party claims which would interfere with this duty. Irishmen should steadfastly unite together in this country for the purpose of exerting their moral power in favor of their native land, as well as for the purpose of exerting their legislative power in order to secure and maintain those political rights provided by the Constitution. If these rights should be divided and weakened by political partyism.

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

ADDRESS TO HON. JOHN COSTIGAN.

A Tribute From His Fellow-Countrymen.

The following address has recently been forwarded to the Hon. Mr. Costigan:— To the Hon. John Costigan, P.C., Minister of Inland Revenue, Ottawa. Sir,—We, the undersigned Irishmen, a few of your many admirers in and around the counties of Richmond and Drummond, P.Q., desire to express our approval of your political course, as well as our high esteem for your character as a citizen and gentleman, and especially our sincere and profound appreciation of your efforts and services on behalf of Ireland and Irishmen in general. We avail ourselves with pleasure of this occasion to express to you our gratitude for the signal service you have rendered to Ireland's national cause at the last session of Parliament by the judicious framing, timely introduction and triumphant passage of those famous and ever memorable "Irish Resolutions" of sympathy for Ireland's sufferings, and their friendly and well-timed advice directed towards the amelioration of her wrongs by the re-establishment of her just, constitutional and inalienable rights. It is well for Ireland and her cause that, while her most eminent and efficient sons are engaged in a tremendous struggle on her enanguined soil, against injustice, prejudice, and tyrannical legislation, their hands are being strengthened and their efforts efficiently seconded by their loyal fellow-countrymen and co-religionists in every corner and section of the New World. Whilst the whole Continent, from Hudson's Bay to the Gulf of Mexico, pours forth pecuniary aid from rich and poor, from cabin, cottage, hut and hall, thousands of uninitiated emigrants throughout the length and breadth of this great land, sustained by the intellect, patriotism, and education of Ireland's expatriated sons, by lecture and editorial pen, in pulpits and legislative hall, testify to the undying enmity of Ireland's remotest sons to injustice and oppression, as they testify to the depth and sincerity of their efforts and demands for the removal of existing wrongs, and for the national recognition of Ireland. Over and above the allegiance due to our religion and our adopted country, the next highest duty is imposed by patriotism—devotion to our native land, a land of which the greatest and best of us may well be proud. Ireland is not only our father-land which we honor, it is also the cradle and purest fountain of our religion which we revere and cherish; unless we desire to be reduced to the condition of the Jews, outcasts and wanderers without a national retreat, our only course is to be united in defence of our native land. We should repudiate and disavow all political ties and party claims which would interfere with this duty. Irishmen should steadfastly unite together in this country for the purpose of exerting their moral power in favor of their native land, as well as for the purpose of exerting their legislative power in order to secure and maintain those political rights provided by the Constitution. If these rights should be divided and weakened by political partyism.

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

As she stood full in the sunlight the reporter could see that her hair had been raised in a way that he had forehad. She was a young woman of uncertain step. As she moved away two passing Chinamen spoke to her and she replied. A few minutes later another girl of perhaps 10 years emerged from the same doorway. She was a comely girl and carried a can in her hand. After looking around cautiously for at least two minutes she returned to the gloomy doorway and called out another girl of about her own age and size. They chatted on the sidewalk for a little while and used shocking language. Then one of the pair walked across the street and stopped near the reporter. The unfortunate girl's face wore a terrible look. The eyes were fishy, the lips swollen and the cheeks bloodshot. One of the gentlemen present recognized the girl and said he knew her name. She was raised through opium, he said. Another young girl, with the usual white face and faltering step, came down to the door and was soon joined by a woman with a bandage around her head, who appeared to be a person in authority. She spoke to the girl sharply about standing at the door. Just then a young Chinaman, dressed in American clothing, walked up the street and whispered to one of the girls. He then beckoned to two flashily dressed young men who were standing in a shadowy nook near by and a moment later the young men and girls were chatting at the door. Two Chinamen went into the hallway, but hurried out again as if alarmed. Two young girls went into the opium den at No. 18 Mott street at about 11 o'clock, and the reporter saw several girls go from No. 11 Mott street into a saloon at the corner of Chatham street, where they drank some beer. In some instances the little ones were accompanied by

A. MACDONALD.

1883. SPRING AND SUMMER FASHIONS. 1883.

I beg to inform my customers and the general public that I have just received my

SPRING SAMPLES OF TWEEDS,

the quality and pattern of which have been unrivalled heretofore.

ALSO A SUPERIOR ASSORTMENT OF WEST OF ENGLAND TROUSERINGS.

A. MACDONALD,

MERCHANT TAILOR,

355 YONGE STREET.

SPECIAL ATTRACTIONS IN MANITOBA!

Parties intending to go to the Great North-West will find that farms can be bought at a lower figure in this city than any other.

Splendid Farms in Well-Selected Localities at $6.00 per acre.

A LARGE NUMBER OF IMPROVED FARMS In Manitoba and Dakota at Bargains.

To any person desiring to locate in any of the Colonization Settlements, I can offer Special Inducements in early numbers of Scrip and Stock.

Full description of all Farms can be found in my Office.

Will Exchange North-West Property for Toronto City or Ontario Farm Property.

G. A. SCHRAM,

4 KING STREET EAST.