Icebergs.

Editor Evening Telegram.
Dear Sir,—A few days ago readers of the Chronicle were regaled with a report of a rather lengthy speech on education by the Hon. P. T. McGrath. Of course the speech contained very little but gas, but at the same time the honorable gentleman displayed a great zeal for education. To one reading the article on the "Formation of Icebergs" that appeared in last evening's Chronicle, the thought that education should begin in the Chronicle office very reasonably presents itself.

The article in question is copied from the Plaindealer, but has so striking a resemblance to the stuff which fills the pages of "Newfoundland in 1911" that rightly or wrongly I incline to the belief that Mr. McGrath himself is the author of it. Whether he is or not, he gives it his sanction, and introduces it to the readers of the Chronicle in these words, "In this issue will be found an article on icebergs." And it is certainly a very clever article on icebergs. The column and a half of essays presents such a tangle of pseudo scientific matter that to offer it criticism is altogether beyond the power of any serious person.

If Mr. Twain had ever been in Greenland one might think that he was the writer of it—it reminds one so forcibly of "A Tramp Abroad." The manner in which the bergs are made to dive and roll and plunge and otherwise disport themselves is truly wonderful, and reads almost like a fairy story. Somehow there is a touch of rare genius in the manner in which the launching of the young iceberg is told. The artillery effect is truly wonderful. The sun shining from the tops of the mountains is very cleverly narrated. When a child I used to think that by climbing to the top of Signal Hill I could get the moon. Had I but known it, oh, Mr. McGrath, I might have gone to Greenland and got a big haul sun about. What other delightful stories have you for us, Mr. McGrath? Please come out with them while you are in an educative mood. Perhaps you could hunt up some stories of wrecking and plundering on the south coast. You used to tell us lots of such hair-raising and blood-curdling stories through the foreign press, have you forgotten the style? Perhaps you could tell us something about the pinnipeds, something like the very clever story of the seal hunt which appeared in the Montreal Star a week ago.

ARTHUR ENGLISH.
P. S.—Since writing the above I have seen Mr. McGrath's "Perils of the Icebergs" in to-night's Chronicle, and taken from it Clure's Magazine for June 1904. It contains some rather astounding statements in relation to icebergs in real McGrath style. It is not my intention to deal with all the exaggerated statements. I will deal with just one, which, I think, suffice to show how superficial Mr. McGrath's acquaintance with truths relating to things he often writes about. I would not bother my head about Mr. McGrath's trashy magazine effusions were it not that my aversion to fakery is real, and I like to put every man in his place, as it were. When I see a jackdaw strutting in the plumage of the peacock, I like to strip him of the borrowed plumage, especially if the jackdaw be saucy and abusive. In the story of icebergs, as appearing in to-night's Chronicle, we are told of bergs of 500 feet in height above the sea and half a mile long. Here is what Mr. McGrath says: "Nature offers few more impressive sights than these beautiful ivory sea castles, often 500 feet high and half a mile long." Where, it may be asked, has Mr. McGrath ever seen an iceberg 500 feet high? But that is not the astounding part of it. The astounding part is, that Mr. McGrath's bergs stand on end. He says seven-eighths of the ice is beneath the water. I think he will find next time he measures one of those 500 feet high bergs that his figure is a bit in error. He will find that a great deal more than seven-eighths is beneath the water. However, we will take his figures that would make his 500 feet high berg 4,000 feet high and only 2,540 feet long (½ mile). Bergs of such extreme length are always flat, tabular masses, and do not rise into peaks. His bergs, then, defy gravitation, and stand on end. Have you any more wonders to relate, Mr. Mac?

DARWIN.

BY H. L. RANN.

Thirty years ago to-day Charles Robert Darwin, the eminent English scientist, departed this life at the age of 74 years. Before he departed, however, he started a train of melancholy reflections by declaring, in a chatty treatise of several thousand words, no two of which were ever used before, that man is a lineal descendant of the aboriginal ape. Darwin's discovery did not tend to popularize him to any great extent, and when he died no mention was made of the floral offerings. Also a great many people who had been digging around the roots of the family tree, in the effort to locate some of their ancestors, lost interest in the search and secreted the family photograph album. Darwin's biographer states that he was reluctant to make a monkey out of man, as he had some relatives who did not care to be used as exhibitors, but the path of duty lay plain before him. Darwin's theory is that man sprang from the grizzled pollywog and that it was 12,000,000 years before he sprouted the classic features of the orang-outang. This theory has put quite a dent in the enthusiasm of people who try to trace a blue-blooded ancestry back to the fall of Sodom and Gomorrah. It is a very annoying thing to institute a genealogical survey and have it end up in a bamboo forest, close to the haunts of the ring-tailed gorilla. It must have been a pleasing sight to see Darwin in front of the monkey cage at the London Zoo, discussing the origin of man with the head chimpanzee and feeding salted peanuts to his offspring. Darwin often said that the only difference he could see between man and the monkey is that the monkey parts his hair on one side and prefers the pipe to the cigarette. This was a very coarse generalization and did not help the sale of Darwin's books any, as it touched family pride in a sore spot.

Dined Last Night

Supporters of the brigade dined a number of C. C. C. members at the hotel last evening, which was nicely decorated for the event. Covers were laid for about fifty persons and all enjoyed themselves to the utmost. Following the menu, excellently prepared by Furlong Bros., the toast list was taken up when speeches and songs were in order. The company dispersed at 2 a.m. by the singing of "Auld Lang Syne" and the National Anthem.

Absentees Return Again.

By the last Bruce there came a man named Graham, of H. Grace, who had been absent about 26 years. He holds a good position in Montreal and came to see his friends. Capt. Swift of England, also arrived by the Bruce and it is likely will reside at Bay of Islands in future. Some thirty years ago he was in this country and married a Miss Mitchell, of Pouch Cove, who has since died. He is a well-to-do man and has a good regard for Newfoundland.
