(Mr. Essery) had defeated the South London people when he cut off their water, and even left the public schools without a supply, while only fever-tainted water was left the little ones to drink.

Ald. Spencer met the argument that his opponent was a better was than himself

And. Spencer met the regument that mopponent was a hetter man than himself because he was a lawyer. "A fellow who knows it all," he said, "is apt to want to do it all—(laughter)—and the fellow who does not know it all is willing to go slow and take advice from his elders." do it all—[laughter]—and the fellow who does not know it all is willing to go slow and take advice from his elders." (Applause.) He believed in being sure he was right before he went ahead. Ald. Spencer referred to the mis construction the other candidate had put on his proposal to hold citizens meetings to discuss the L. and P. S. R. question. He did not believe as his opponent did that the responsible ratepayers of London could be bought up by a corporation or clique. (Applause.) He would trust the leading citizens to aid the Council by their advice in arranging the preliminaries, but before any scheme was adopted it must be submitted by lylaw to the whole people, and duly voted on. That was his view, and he believed the citizens would support him in carrying it out. Ald. Spencer resumed hir seat amid loud applause, and the meeting shortly afterwards adjourned.

quite right, and I hope you will come, for I cannot bear to see him fret."

And then she remembered that she had not ordered the peny-carriage, and that Ford would be saddling one of the horses; so she rang for Ellerton, and made him anderstand very carefully, that Ford was to drive over to the Grange and take the note, and that he must wait and bring Miss & errers back with him. "For you must know, Ellerton," she said, with a pathetic dignity, but not looking at the old servant, "that Sir Hugh feels himself worse, and wants to say good-bye to his old friend;" "for of course." thought Fay, when Ellerton had left the library with tears in his eyes, "if Hugh and she were engaged, all the servants must know, and it was better for me to speak out like that."

When Margaret read that poor little note the tears fell fast and blotted the page. "Thank God she knows at last," she said to herself as she folded it up, and then hurriedly prepared to obey the summons. She hoped that she would not see Lady Redmond before that parting with Hugh were over, for she needed all her strength for that; and to her great relief only Ellerton received her. She was ushered for a few minutes into the empty drawing-room, and then Sir Hugh's nurse came down to her, and said Dr. Martin had just left the house, and her master would see Miss Ferrers now.

And there was no one in the sick-room when she entered it, though the nurse had told her that she would be in the dressing-room within call. There was no one to see the flash of joy in the sick man's eyes, when Margaret's cold lips touched his forehead, or to lear his low "Margaret, darling," that greeted her.

And no one knew what passed between them but their guardian angels; only Hugh's miserable selfish passion sunk down abashed as he listened to this brave, sweet woman who was not ashamed to tell him how she loved him, and how she would low.

And she told him what he had never guessed, that were he free she would never marry him or any man, for in her trouble long ago she had vowed herself to Heaven; and with a few forcible words she showed him the plan and purpose of her features. and with a few forcible words she showed him the plan and purpose of her future life— when Raby should have ceased to need her; drawing such calm pictures of a tender ministry and a saintly sisterhood, that Hugh, looking at her with dazzled eyes, though he could almost discern a faint halo tound her head.

"No," he murmured, restlessly, "but she is only a child;" but Margaret shook her head.

"You are wrong, she is not a child, nor ever will be again." And then very gently she urged him when he was stronger to tell Fay the whole story of their engagement; for she was afraid if those few words that he confessed were allhe had said it must have made her very unhappy; but Hagh would not allow this. He told Margaret that she did not understand Fay, or how young and innocent she really was; she did not seem agitated or disturbed when he had really asked to see Margaret—she had answered him quite tranquilly; he was sure she would not suffer from the knowledge of their engagement, for he was always kind to her and she loved him; and then he added bitterly that the suffering was his, but when he got well, if he ever did get well, he would go away, for he could not go on living like this.

And she tried to leave him, for, strong as she was, she could not have borne this seems much longer, and Hugh was terribly exhausted.

In the corridor she met Saville.

"Please find the nurse and send her to Sir Hugh," she said, hurriedly, "and tell Ford I want him to take a note over to Sandycliffe," and then she went into the library and wrote a few words.

"DEAR MISS FERRERS—My husband wishes to see you; will you come to him at once? He thinks that he is very ill, and cannot live, and he wishes to bid you goodbye. He has told met freezon, and it is quite right, and I hope you will come, for I cannot bear to see him fret."

"I told Dr. Conway that you were coming, and he thought it would do no harm, and Dr. Martin said the same. He knows you, he says, and he was sure that you would not excite him. No, do not tell me anything about it. I—I can trust you, and Hugh would not like me to know."

"Indeed you are mistaken," began Margaret, eagerly, but Fay checked her with a little dignity.

"Neven mind that. Do you know, Miss Forrers, that Dr. Conway says that my husband is better, that he will not die, it is only weakness and a nervous fancy; but though he is so slow in getting well, they notice a gradual improvement."

"Thank God, for your sake, Lady Redmond." But as she said this a painful flush mounted to Fay's forchead.

"You should say for his sake," she returned, qnickly. "What does it matter about me! Perhaps before the summer is over we may be at rest together, baby and I."

over we may be at rest together, baby and I."

"Lady Redmond! Oh! I can not bear it;" and here Margaret burst into tears. Yes, she who had parted dry-eyed from her lover wept bitterly for the deceived and unhappy wife.

"Why do you cry, Miss Ferrers?" asked Fay, in the same subdued voice. "It seems to me that if God would take us both it would be so much better for us all. Nobody wants us"—and here her lips quivered—"and I should not like my baby to live without me, What could Hugh do with it, you know?"

"My child," replied Margaret, checking her sobs, "is this your faith? is this your woman's courage? Would you who love him so be content to die without winning your husband's heart?"

Fay looked at her wonderingly.

"It is yours to win," she continued. "Oh! do not look at me like that, as though I have murdered you happiness, What have you done, you poor child, that you should suffer like this for my sake. For the sake of my future peace of mind I entreat you to listen to me."
