Mr. Foster submitted to the House estimates for the payment of $500 additional indemnity to the members. He said the Government had decided to do this for these reasons: The session had been unusually long, having occupied five months, with very heavy duties; the session has been at a time of the year when business men and professions! men and farmers had to leave their homes at great inconvenience and loss to themselves. It had for these reasons been strongly urged upon the Government by members of both sides of the House that it would be only fair to allow increased sessional idemnity. and by Sir Richard Cartwright.

Mr. Laurier said he was prepared to approve and indorse what Mr. Foster indicated and indorse what Mr. Foster indicated. He was sure the public would realize that the members of the House with viery few exceptions are men who depend upon their labor for their living and have no capital except that which their labor brings them. Under these circumstances it was impossible to do the duties of a session which lasted as this had for five months without serious loss to them. This increase, he said, was not to be a permanent increase. This was justified by the unusual length of St. Petersburg yesterday with imposing The firm of Arthur Levy & Co., merchants, with branches at Liverpool, Manchester and Bradford, are in difficulties. This was justified by the unusual length of the session, and it was to be remembered that taken with the general election through which members had passed, it meant the absolute cessation of their business for six months this year.

Sir Richard Cartwright said the expressions which the Minister of Finance had made would be approved on both sides of this House, whether they may be outside

Dr. Ferguson—Pull down your vest and sit down.

Mr. Mulock said that if the question rested upon the length and severity of the session there would be no objection to it, but the weak point about it was that the members of this House were passing judgment upon their own claims, and it could not be expected that they would be unbiased judges. Therefore he regretted that this addition was necessary.

Mr. Foster—It will be easily done.

Mr. Mulock said he regretted that they burdens of public life did not fall equally upon all. He was aware, that many members had sacrificed all to the service of the State, and a session such as this fell with especial severity upon them. He believed there should be legislation that would provide for exceptional sessions, and he hoped the Government would introduce at the next session a measure which would not effect the members of this Parliament who would make such a provision. The House he members of this Parliament who would

Mr. McMullen said he was sorry the condicien of affairs necessitated Parliament sitting for five months. He hoped the members would not again be called upon to vote an additional indemnity, but that a statute would be brought forward next session by the Government. He sympathized with what the member for North York said. He realized that when the session stretched out to five months the $1,000 indemnity would be required to pay for the incidental expenses of living here Speaking of the expense of Parliament, he said it would be well to reduce the number of representatives by one-half. Mr. Mills (Bothwell) said he believed the proposition was reasonable and in the public interest. He would make no apology for supporting what he believed to be proper. (Hear, hear.) He said he had no right to represent a constituency if he was not as ready to defend his own rights as those of his constituency. It was necessary in a country like this, where millionaires were not sitting in Parliament, but men who must follow some avocation for a livelihood, that there should be a reasonable indemnity.
