The Nugents of Carriconna

An Irish Story, By Tighe Hopkins, author of "Twixt Love and Duty," "For Free-DOM," ETC.

He started immediately efter breakfast, driving on a neighbor's car to the station. Dora passed the morning in no great con-tentment. Her relations with Kitty and Dora passed the morning in no great contentment. Her relations with Kitty and Lady Frayne had always come short of cordiality, and greater frequency of intercourse had no ripening effect on them. The sun was hot as ever; Trenchard did not come; and the key in Dora's pocket seemed trying to draw her like a magnet back to the tower. She was growing positively out of temper, and as Dora never permitted herself an chullition of that sort, she summoned her philosophy to assist her to dissemble. Then she was vexed with herself for being vexed at Trenchard's nonappearance. Then she grew uneasy on his account; what more likely than that he should be suffering from his over-exertion in yesterday's heat, and Dora remembered that he had a long afternoon's work of his own to get through after he left her.

She dreaded some relapse, should he have returned home at night exhausted and weak. The pienic lunch, served under the have returned home at night exhausted and weak. The picnic lunch, served under the trees as before, bored her unspeakably. The strongly self-assertive humor of her hostess was never less than a trial to Dora's nerves, and this morning made her quite cross, though she continued to smile her sweetest. Barbara's unruffled equanimity in all situations and circumstances only discomposed her the more, and it was perfectly exasperating to be obliged to watch without seeming to be so the placid raptures of Kitty and Arthur, billing and cooing remorselessly under her eyes.

"What about those three men that were taken at Carriconna the other night, did they come up for trial yet?" asked Lady

"The book the master said he promised you, ma'am," said the sergeant.
"Thank you, sergeant," said Dora quietly; perfectly aware that Trenchard had promised her no book at all.
"Well, Sarah," said Barbara, "Mr.
Trenchard's not coming, I suppose?"
"He says he's not very well," said Lady Frayne, reading the letter at half arm's length through her glasses. "He says he has sent a better man to take his place; that's you, sergeant, I suppose."
Sergeant Jones answered with a salute, but no smile broke the firm line of his closested lips. The sergeant was even graver than ordinary.

"The book the master said he promised you, ma'am," said the promised for children teething. It southes the college of the remaining all pain, cures wind colle, and is the best remedy for diarrhea. In twenty years there has been no counter-feiting of Unole Sam's postage stamps.

"I don't know where he got it," answered the sergeant, "but that isn't the question at present. I must bring him round again, I think." "Couldn't you leave him awhile, William?

wakes, you know," said the motherly woman.

"It's only putting it off a bit; there's no good in that. He'll have to wake now or by-and-by."

"It's a dreadful thing," said his wife piteously, rocking herself to and fro in her chair. "To fight against it all these days, as we've seen him doing, and then be beaten back like this, and just have to begin it all over again."

The sergeaut was a strong man himself; the straight path of duty had been an easy one to him all his life; he had no clear understanding of the weaknesses by which natures less simple and less vigorous are betrayed; but he had seeu his master do sturdy battle with himself in this sad business, and he answered.

sturdy battle with himself in this sad business, and he answered:

"Yes, it is; I know it. And there's those that wouldn't try to stand up against it again. But he will, the master will, even after this. I'll go and wake him."

He went upstairs again to Trenchard's room. He thought it probable that it would be necessary for him, as he had done before, to administer a fresh doze of opium, to bring the sleeper to himself again.

Opening the door he saw that Trenchard was awake. The sergeant went over to him at once, and in a tone as if nothing had taken at Carriconna the other night, did they come up for trial yet?" asked Lady Frayne.

"No, but I think they are to be brought up in about a week," answered Arthur; "I have been trying to persuade his worship to come forward as little as possible in that matter; and since he has cooled down I think he'll be more or less amenable; but the worst of it is, you see, the matter is out of our hands entirely. It's very well they have as good a fellow as Trenchard to deal with."

"Tis so, indeed," assented Lady Frayne.

"What men are they?" asked Kitty.

"One of the turf stealers is amongst them," said Arthur; "he's a Carriconna tenant. Another is Cassidy from Gravelmount, and the third is a tenant of Trenchard's. He has had notice to quit, I am sorry to say."

"A nice little kettle of fish, upon my word," said Lady Frayne.

"Talking of Trenchard," said Barbara,
"isn't this his sergeant yones leaped the stone
