His Singular and Perfect Power

We said last week when discussing the future of the Slav in Europe that his real character was still unrevealed; and that is essentially true, for of the A sewing machine was stolen from Russian as he would be after, say, a a house in Tilsonburg in broad day-century of freedom we know nothing. light the other day. He alleges that the sian now does, nor is there any other white people in which the idea of individual right is so imperfectly developed. Still, something is known of the present Slav, which is sufficient to give the attentive a glimpse of his character as it is and will probably remain. In the first place, it is clear that he belongs to no branch of the There has not been a struggle for the other great white families, but is a mayoralty in Windsor since D. They all have their business to do, and they make themselves do it, mission seems degrading, can suspend the action of his own conscience when he has resolved on any action, say, assassination, which afflicts it. This selfcontrol, which is perfect, would make Russian has energy, it is true, but it is not of the true western kind, which goes on whatever the obstacle, determined not to stop till one is out on the other side. The energy of the Russian is that of the under-vitalized man, who does not stop and does not change, but who advances languidly, with halts, and with a proclivity to dying before his work is finished. Russian armies ordered beyond the frontier melt away imperceptibly, their own generals cannot say why. Foreigners declare that Combs and Whisks. It is all bad feeling, or bad clothing, or liability to disease, and talk of Russian corruption and savagery; but the soldier marching westward or southward is as well fed as he ever was, and his clothing is better, for the air is warmer, and yet he disappears. The cause is want of "stamina"—that is, energy in the reservoir-more than want supplies. You see the same thing in other departments of life. Nothing in Russia ever quite succeeds, unless, in-20 or 30 social reforms which have been suggested and adopted in this generation, not one has realized wha

A little more persistence swelled neck and crick in the back, might make them all succeed, but that is only to be evoked by "supreme orwhich is not forthcoming. The The library of Nottingen has a Bible second deficiency is the first carried a step farther-the readiness of Russians, noticed by all who write of them Give Holloway's Corn Cure a trial. or live among them, to despair. Their vast plains breed hopelessness. Englishman face to face with Chat Moss works on and on till it is filled; the Frenchman tears his hair and works in spasms instead of steadily but still he also fills the Moss; the Russian, accustomed to be defeated by nature, and lacking something within himself which is best defined, though not quite accurately defined, as energy, despairs. His own writers say he hope; but the Englishman, who never despairs, is the least sanguine of mankind, and the Frenchman declares that hope is over, but that he must still go on. The Russian stops. And finally, the Russian is differentlated from all other European races by the quality of excess. In him there is no moderation. It is constantly said

Russian favors you, he is the friend who is closer than a brother; if he hates you he is dangerous; if he is obedient it is perinde ac cadaver; if he is mutinous he bakes his officers in the regimental ovens. If he is a philanthropist he strips himself of civilization and becomes a peasant; if he is benevolent he will give away all he possesses. The Russian Liberal, as his government knows too well, is a revolutionist, who would make a clean sweep of authority; the Russian Broad Churchman is the most utter of disbelievers, and unlike the English skeptic, holds all acts to be indifferent if their object was vaguely good. The Russian reactionary, on the other hand, regards Liberals as the Catholic regards blasphemers, that is, as men who until repentant are outside the pale of humanity. No people except the Russian could have produced either the Russian form of loyalty or the Nihilists. Limitations on power seem to the Russian illogical, as no doubt they also seemed to the Roman, while suspended belief, the English attitude to-wards many details of Christianity, is impossible to his temper. Whence this tendency to excess arises we find it difficult to decide, for it does not arise from the magnitude of his dominion, as is so often asserted; but it is probable in the absolute way in which it strikes the mind of a child. What the race will do with itself when it has attained its full development, and spread to the Persian Gulf and the Yellow Sea, belongs rather to the domain of prophecy main on the appearance, or non-appearance, of a really great czar; but the chances are that it will make some immense effort, either in the way of conquest or of social revolution, will disappointed, and will wait, possibly for centuries, in languor and unchange-ableness.
