The regular freight coming east, instead of stopping at the semaphore west of the station, came thundering on, and pitched into another freight train which had just come down the Galt branch, and several cars of which were standing on the main line. The cars were overturned and badly damaged. One of them was filled with horses, and the injuries sustained by one of the animals will prove fatal. The damage will be considerable. A gang of men were set to work to clear the track which was done in a few hours.

About a year ago Alexander Anderson, an devise a plan whereby the dangers to brakesmen and yardmen in coupling cars would be avoided. He claims to have succeeded. The invention consists of an iron block which slides backward and forwards in the drawbar or drawhead. This block holds up the pin and the link on the other car is held in its position by a sort of staple which drops after the shunt is made. When the link strikes the iron block inside the drawhead the pin drops into the link and the car is coupled. The invention is a good one and Mr. Anderson says his appliance will only cost 50 cents more than the ordinary coupler used on the Grand Trunk nary coupler used on the Grand Trunk and other roads.

I am of those who believe that the ends of the preachers of these doctrines. I am of those who believe that the ends of the preachers of these doctrines. The tack was in a wretched condition on account of rain. The we are off from the attainment of that state of political beatitude. For what attained the all we are off from the attainment of that state of political beatitude. For what a separate State, we showing false colors. If they want to cut the thread of British connection, which they have done their best to attenuate, let them say so and have done with it. In disguising their aims and instructing their paid agents to clamor for independence, they disentitle themselvės to common respect. They show however their recognition of such a thing as popular sentiment, which they know will require a good deal of educating and directing before the people of the dominion make up their minds to cut loose from the mother country for the benefit of a few wealthy capitalists who want to become wealthier.

The position of England towards the dominion is by no means an uncertain one, and in face of this fact I cannot understand the unjust and ungenerous allusions to her foreign and colonial policy, which sometimes find a place in Canadian journals. Everybody knows, or ought to know that in giving us confederation she gave us the right to dispose of our own future. The England of the people as Mr. Goldwin Smith has truly said, has no desire but that the she shell be the markless of free patients. Smith has truly said, has no desire but that she shall be the mother of free nations. Even now there is a by no means uninfluential section of English politicians which does not disguise its desire to be rid of all of the self-governing colonies. These politicians are not perhaps so strong in numbers as they were when John Brights' isolated and independent he suffered as I numbers as they were when John Bright isolated and independent, he suffered, as I declared Canadian loyalty to be believe he will ere long suffer, from over declared Canadian loyalty to be essentially a selfish sentiment, and when Robert Lowe in looking to the colonies for a solid repast found nothing but the banquet of the Barmecide. But even these I apprehend would hold that England has acquired a right to decide when her offspring for whom she has done so much are capable of asserting and maintaining their independence. There are imperial as well as colonial interests at stake, and however much the Canadian nationalist may wish to precipitate matters, there are older and wiser heads in England to be consulted. And I do not think the Dominion parliament, although it occasionally does some queer things, will be likely to stultify itself by asking England to cut us adrift until it is thoroughly satisfied that we can sail our own ship in safety without an imperial convoy. We are told about the "good wishes of our cousins to the south." How have those good wishes been exemplified to us of late good wishes been exemplified to us of late years and what would have happened to us after their civil war and before the disafter their civil war and before the dis-bandment of their armies if we had not England at our back? And have we no been told time and again that confederation is only going to ripen the rich plum which is destined ultimately to fall into uncle Sam's lap, and are they not all the time sighing for the time when in the words of one of their poets they will see

Even The World goes so far as to say, "Why should we linger over the disjointed fragments of a pot-luck repast it is asstonishing what an amount of silly writing there is just now about independence, and about the significance of the recent vote in the dominion election. Even The World has said some things not exactly in order. For instance, on the fifteenth anniversary of confederation you said tha: "for the first time in fifteen years it was decided on the 20th of June that Canadians have the right to shape their own fiscal policy." What you probably meant was that, by the vote of the 20th of June, Canada so far emphasized her former decision to shut out of her territory as far as possible all foreign (including British) manufactures, that it amounted to a declaration of commercial independence. For, as a matter of fact, the right to decide upon our fiscal policy came to us with the boon of responsible government, and since for the proposition of the proposition of the spirit in which those the say." Why should we linger over the disjointed fragments of a pot-luck repast when there is glorious and well-appointed base, when there is glorious and well-appointed base, when there is glorious and well-appointed base, which should we linger over the disjointed fragments of a pot-luck repast when there is a glorious and well-appointed base, when there is a glorious and well-appointed fragments of a pot-luck repast when there is a glorious and well-appointed base, when there is a glorious and well-appointed fragments of a pot-luck repast when there is a glorious and well-appointed the summer is a gent of a domestic, answering the summer acter of a domestic, answering the summ civil word to say of her, or of her children when they come among us. Our nativism is the nativism of knownothings who have never moved outside of their own borders and who think five milions of Cauadians can whip creation. But our old politicians know better, consequently they never tire of airing our loyalty to the throne, our admiration of British institutions (particularly when they want to borrow any money) and our desire that the connection of the Dominion with the amount of the Dominion with the amount our desire that the borrow any money) and our desire that the connection of the Dominion with the empire may be perpetuated. I for one do not wonder if young Canadians chafe, and yearn to find a way out of a position so humiliating. I understand their desire for independence and their anxiety to get outside of the beaten tracks of old colonialism. What I do not understand is that torm lowelists engod in manufactures air tory loyalists engaged in manufactures, air their loyalty in public and secretly advo-production, with no secrifice market on hand and the consuming classes le s able than they are now to bolster up grinding monopolies.

In conclusion, let me say that, so far as the independence cry is concerned I believe it will be to England's advantage and our it will be to England's advantage and our own that we separate when the time is ripe for separation. Much, however, will have to be done, before that haleyon, day arrives 1: will be time enough to talk seriously about it when we have finished the Pacific railway; reflected our canal system; opened up a route from the granaries of Saskatchewan and Peace river districts through Hudson Bay and straits to Liverpool—a route which if practicable, will do more than any one thing towards making Canada a nation; formed a respectable nucleus of an army and navy, and secured at least five millions of additional population for our great Northwestern domain. Wounded by an Explosion.
MILTON, N. Y., July 13—While Thos. Fagan, foreman at Cameron & Fagan's contract on the West Shore railroad was tam pering with a hole for a blast in which were mature blast occurred. There were twenty-eight laborers, mostly Italians, employed in the vicinity. Fagan was thrown fifteen feet and badly nurt and landed with a stone feet and badly nurt and landed with a stone weighing 100 pounds on his feet. Two Italians were killed outright, a third had his breast crushed; another was sitting with his legs crushed and a stone on them weighing ave tons. It was impossible to move the stone with jacks. He will die. One Italian is missing and it is supposed he is buried under the ruins. John Fennimore had his leg broken in four places, skull fractured and hip broken, he is fatally in lared. James Sedore was slightly injured and Barner Horan badly, perhaps fatally, burned. Two other Italians had their legs crushed, one will die, the other is doubtful. The Italian boy, water carrier, was terribly burned and will die.
