A fun-loving clerk of a popular hotel in yBrockville, N.T., "on a cool winter's eve," recently lighted a lantern and placed it in a coal stove in the reading room, and sat down to await developments. One by one the guests strolled in, walked up to the guests strolled in, walked up to the guests strolled in, walked up to the stove, rubbed their hands with satisfaction, turned slowly around so as to warm their inecent clerk, took in the situation, felt like kicking the bottom of the hash house, and finally sat down to enjoy the discomfiture of the next victim.

Four gold fish hooks, owned by E. J. Smith of Tucson, Arizona, were unearthed by him in the South American placers. He was at work among the mines near Cali, United States of Colombia, in 1866, and in puling up a small tree by the roots he found there in the sand an even dozen of gold fish hooks of the ordinary size. He took them with him to his own country, and giving some away, he still has four, on which he has been repeatedly asked to put his price, but he prizes them very highly, and could not be persuaded to sell them.
