

VI.

How can thoughts be laid by? Thoughts not dormant individuals. The constant reception of particles a burden. Expansion not sufficient to meet the case. Of the three propositions. 18

CHAPTER III.

On the elements and actions of the soul.—What the elements of the soul are. Perception in the present, in the future, and in the past. The fact of transition. Transition consistent—its cause. The power of stretching out, a mystery. The soul does not leave the body at such times. Of time and distance. Of certain forms assumed. What is the office and power of imagination? Cannot perceive and imagine at the same time. Imagination a dull, and frequently, a wrong perception of things. What memory is. Imagination and perception in the future. Perception goes into the past. Of partly remembering things. Perception widely distributed. Steady perseverance essential. The different stages through which the mind passes. Upon what our success principally depends. Memory a blank without consciousness. Perception in the past also assumes different forms. How transition can be proved. 34

CHAPTER IV.

On the different degrees of deception to which the soul is liable. —A deceitful or treacherous memory. What interest may do in the soul. Is the soul deceived at once, or by degrees? The struggle is long, repeated, and voluntary. Of false forms assumed by the mind. Where does the blame rest? Memory deceitful—why? Of different and just rewards. The difficulties under which we labour from this state of mind at the
