in the conduct of the surgeons is the wise restraint they put upon themselves in respect to the endeavor to find the bullet. Certainly it would have been a triumph to extract it, but to prolong the eperation would have done more harm than the bullet will do where it is. Nature takes care of bullets and ingeniously puts envelopes around them which prevent harm. If the bullet is in the neighborhood of the large arteries near the spinal column it may be a source of evil, but there is a possibility that it is not there. It is said that while the wound is small and clean where the ball entered the stomach, yet at the other side the wound is "large and ragged." Whence this difference? Why should the shape of a ball suddenly change in so short a part of its flight? As the pistol was a weapon of inferior quality the penetrating force of the missile was in great part lost when it had gone thru the abdominal wall and the stomach and touched the posterior wall; and there it met a new resistance, for that wall rests against tissues of a certain solidity. There the bullet may have been flattened, and hence the variation in the wound. If this be true the penetrating force of the missile was perhaps ended there, and when it passed out of the stomach it may have fallen down.

penetrating force of the missile was perhaps ended there, and when it passed out of the stomach it may have fallen downward into the peritoneal cavity.

An observation by the Roentgen rays will clear up this part of the case certainly. In the absence of any dangerous hemorphage, in the good reaction from the shock, both of the wound and the operation, and in the good negative evidence as to peritonitis, and in the fact that the variations from normal pulsation and temperature are so moderate, we find the most hopeful indications that the President's wound will not be fatal.
