Where there are no boxes provided, the carriers often find it necessary to push mail under the door or put it in some place they consider safe, rather than carry the letters back to the office. If there is a strong wind and another door in the house is opened, it happens not infrequently that the draft created blows a letter out again under the door, and the next breeze wafts it down the street.

In this and similar ways letters have been lost, and endless work has resulted for the postoffice staff, the members of which would be relieved if everyone would provide the cheap but handy little slit in the door with box below.
