SAINT JOHN, N. B., THURSDAY EVENING, MAY 6, 1875 VOL IV. ANCHOR LINE. NO FAILURE! SUN HATS! "No, sir, I guess not," replied he, coolly, "To tell you the truth, Reade," said he, lowering his voice, "I expect to take him this very night. I expect him to get aboard this train at some country station. That's why I told you I might break off my story suddenly. That's why I riend made a mistake. "I now went directly to the banks and found that my enterprising thief had his springs on the inner doors of all. On inquiry I learned that he had put them on without compensation, for a month's trial. I thought the bank officials pretty green, for they did not have any idea that anything was wrong, and I took pains not to excite any such. The fellow had been to nearly all the principal stores in the city, but this was only to allay suspicion. I notified the police of the whole plot and they promised to be on whole plot and they promised to be on the whole plot and they promised the whole plot and they promised the For sale by R. E. I notified the police of the whole plot and they promised to be on hand when I wanted them.

I stopped three weeks in this place, waiting around the depots, hoping to get a sight of the men I wanted, but they came not. I was fast getting discouraged, when one afternoon I saw a familiar face at the car window as a train from the East rolled into the station. I had seen it but once before, and that in the evening, but I knew it immediately. It was the face of one of the plotters whom I had overheard in the saloon. It was not the chief, however. He leat the train and I followed him up street. When he got opposite the City Bank he stopped; I did the same. He took a long look, and then backward and forward all the afternoon, with me following behind. This man was a spotter, I knew, but his precise object I couldn't surmise. I determined to arrest him and use him against the others if I could. I went up behind him quietly and laid my hand upon his arm. "You are my prisoner," I said, sharply. The man turned with a scoruful laugh. "What do you charge me with?" he sneeringly said. "Perhaps you mistake your man."

we took them three or four at a time, in different parts of the city, so that made the matter easier. But Haldeman, the man I had wanted so long, the gent emanly leader, was once more lucky enough to make his escape. The bank folks raised a thousand dollars for me, in consideration of my services and I made friend Jim a present of a gold watch for his valuable assistance. The criminals will all get a heavy sentence but the one who confessed. I shall make another thousand when I capture Haldeman, and so shall get handsomely paid for my trouble.

came back hitch his face, and he said, in a husky voice:

"I have been betrayed, but they shall suffer for this yet, the mean traitors!"

I was willing he should think his friends had been false, so I didn't undeceive him. I led him to the station house, where he was safely lodged for the night. There I left him for some hours. When I came back he was bending forward, his head resting on his hands, apparently in great distress of mind. He was young and I telt rather sorry for him.

"I have come, said I, to give you a chance. We know all about your gang. We know your leader very well. We understand the door-spring game perfectly. We shall probably have all of them very soon. Now, if you went a chance for revenge, you can have it, and serve yourself too. You are young, and it is hard to spend thirty years of life in a prison. I will use my influence for you if you will help m."

To make a long story short, after much persuasion and many threats, and after copious appeals to his selfishness and suspiciousness, he confessed all. He gave information that led two nights afterwards to the arrest of ten as desperate villains as there are in Massachust.
