

an increase in efforts at technology and training (developing human resources). Foreign demand must also be cultivated, and Canada must therefore negotiate "increased and secured access to foreign markets for our goods and services, through multilateral and bilateral negotiations." The Government would try, said Mr. Kelleher, to develop the "international consensus necessary to begin a new round of GATT negotiations in such areas as safeguard arrangements, procurement, agricultural trade and trade in high technology." He concluded by emphasizing that the goal of the new government was not to create a "fortress North America . . . but rather to act as a catalyst for cooperative multilateral action" (International Trade Ministry statement, September 25).
