

SELF-RAISED BY EMMA D. M. SOUTHWORTH

Claudia enjoyed the worship, although she despised the worshippers. Her spirits had rebounded from their depression.

She rehearsed in imagination her arrival in London, her introduction to the family of the viscount, her presentation to the queen, and the sensation she would produce at her majesty's drawing room, where she was resolved, even if it should cost her whole fortune, to eclipse every woman present, not only in the perfection of her beauty, but also in the magnificence of her dresses and the splendor of her jewels.

And then she would visit with Lord Vincent all the different seats of his family, and every seat would be the scene of a new ovation! As the bride and the heir she would be idolized by the tenants and retainers of his noble family!

She would, with Lord Vincent, make a tour of the continent; she would see everything worth seeing in nature and in art, modern and antique; she would be presented in succession at every foreign court, and everywhere by her beauty and splendor achieve new successes and triumphs! She would frequent the circles of American ministers, for the express purpose of meeting there her countrywomen and overwhelming by her magnificence those who had once dared to sneer at that high flavor of Indian blood which had given luster to her raven hair and fire to her dark eyes.

And the course of her life should be like that of the sun, beautiful, glorious, regnant, each splendid phase more dazzling than any that had preceded it. Was not this worth the price she had paid for it?

Such were Claudia's dreams and visions. Such the scenes that she daily in imagination rehearsed. She the future life she delighted to contemplate. And nothing—neither the attentions of her husband, the conversation of her companions, nor the beauty and glory of sea and sky could win her from the contemplation of the delightful subject.

Meanwhile in that lovely October weather the "Empress" steamed her way over the sapphire blue sea and neared the cliffs of England.

At length on a fine afternoon in October they entered the mouth of the Mersey River, and two hours later landed at Liverpool.

Soon all was bustle with the custom house officers.

Leaving their luggage in charge of his valet, to be got through the custom house, Lord Vincent hurried Claudia into a cab, followed her, and gave the direction: "To the Crown and the Miter."

"Why not go to the Adelphi? All Americans go there, and I think it the best hotel in the city," said Claudia.

"The Crown and the Miter will serve our turn," was the curt reply of the viscount.

Claudia looked up in surprise at the brusqueness of his answer, and then ventured the opinion: "It is a first class hotel, of course?"

"Humph!" answered his lordship. They left the respectable looking street through which they were driving and turned into a narrow by-street and drove through a perfect labyrinth of narrow lanes and alleys, made hideous by dilapidated and dirty buildings and ragged and filthy people, until at last they reached a dark, dingy-looking inn, whose creaking sign bore the faded letters: "The Crown and the Miter."

"It is not here that you are taking me, Lord Vincent?" exclaimed Claudia in surprise and displeasure, as her eyes fell upon this house and sign.

"It certainly is, Lady Vincent," replied his lordship, with cool civility, as he handed her out of the cab.

"Why this—is this worse than the tavern you took me to in New York. I never was in such a house before in all my life."

"It will have all the attractions of novelty then."

"Lord Vincent, I do beg that you will not take me into this squalid place," she said shrinking back.

"You might find less attractive places than this in the length and breadth of the island," he replied, drawing her hand within his arm and led her into the house.

"Oh!" exclaimed Claudia, in irrepressible disgust.

"You will get used to those little inconveniences after a while, dear," said his lordship.

A man with a greasy white apron and a soiled napkin approached them and bowed.

"A bedroom and parlor and supper immediately," was Lord Vincent's order to the functionary.

"Yes sir. We can be happy to accommodate you, sir, with a bedroom but the parlor, sir, is out of our power, we have none vacant at the present time, but tomorrow sir—" began the polite waiter, when Lord Vincent cut him short with: "Show us into the bedroom then!"
