"I think not. You don't know me at all well if you think I mistake the nature of the feelings which prompt you. When I offered to sacrifice my revenge for you, your hatred of me was stronger than your fear, and showed itself in the manner of your reply with a plainness I can never for-Now that fortune has put proofs against you into my hands, your fear has grown even stronger than your hatred, and would perhaps enable you, if I were so blind as I once was, to de ceive me for a few moments-long enough to get an oath from me-into the belief that there was some spark of womanly gratitude down in your heart. But I am not blind now, nor so foolish as to make any mistake about the amount of your regard for me." He poured out his words vehemently and without pause; but the sobs into which she broke, without attempting to interrupt him, disturbed him and caused his voice to become a little uneven before he came to the end.
"What—what proofs do you mean?"

she sobbed, getting to the pith of his discourse through all her emotion. He picked up the pocket-book which she had forgotten, and said, shortly: "Perhaps that will satisfy you." She dried her eyes and opened it without any appearance of trepidation; for, after all, there was nothing very serious now that her husband did not know. It was a pocket-book very similar to the older one she had examined James in his assumed name of Harry Hammond. This one contained entries nade in the same scrawling, unrecognizable hand and in the same irregular and unmethodical fashion, and she was startled to find that there were frequent passages in which she herself, as "Deldee," was alluded to with fervor and fondness, of which James' some-

Geraldine read it and raised her head quickly. "That entry does not refer to your sister, as you think. In a few days I believe I shall be able to prove to you whom it does refer to. In the meantime doesn't it seem strange to you that in these entries—which date, I see, from last July, the time when you believed larges and your sister to you believed James and your sister to have been traveling abroad together— there should be no other reference which can be supposed to apply to her?
