

2. This University is strictly non-sectarian, and students of all religions are welcomed within its doors. No distinction has ever been made in its attitude towards students of different races and creeds, but rather on the other hand has its policy in this respect been broad and impartial.

3. It has a normal registration of two thousand students, at least sixty percent of whom come from outside the city. Many of these young men, after graduation, take up residence in Montreal, and assume a leading part in the professions of Law, Science, and Medicine. It may be justly claimed, therefore, that McGill is the means of adding many desirable citizens to the city of Montreal.

4. Unlike the University of Toronto, it is not a tax-supported institution, and receives from the Government of the Province an annual grant of only $25,000.00.

5. Although McGill has received in the past many large private endowments, its total income at the present time is quite inadequate to permit of that expansion which is absolutely necessary to meet the ever increasing demands that are being made upon it. In these times of reconstruction, McGill University does in
