or Lee received self as recruits, on on that day geant Champe, y week, escaped from his commander, the traitor, came into eamp, to the intense surprise of all save we four who were concerned in the plot.

I would there was time for me to set dowr the details of his reception when all the story had been told the men, while they were drawn up in line, with the sergeant, Master Baldwin, David and I facing the ranks.

However, it may be that at some time in the future, when we shall have given the redecats a few more doses such as we administered to Lord Rawdon's troops the day after the sergeant came into camp, the opportunity will present itself for me to set down in better fashion than I have been able to do in this tale, all that was said and done when the men of Lee's Legion understood that their sergeant-major had never been in truth a deserter, but one who risked everything, even life itself, for the Cause.

THE END.
