Here 'Tis; Here's The Stuff The Germans Fight On

Here is a photograph of one of the packages—actual size—which every German soldier carries in his pocket. He carries half a dozen of them. When he's hungry and there is nothing else in the vicinity to eat, he opens the wrapper at one end, pours the powdery stuff inside into a dish of hot water and at once he has two bowls of good soup, a whole, satisfying, nourishing meal.

It is the famous German army pea-soup you have read about. The scientists say a man needs 3 1/4 pounds of food a day. This little package, weighing a trifle over two ounces including waterproof wrapper, contains the same food values as three and a half pounds of table food.

Twenty per cent of the whole is bacon, the remainder peas. The cooked peas and bacon are dried, and reduced to powder. It makes a perfect food for the man who does the amount of labor a soldier is called upon to perform. The proteids and starch build up the body and nourish it; the bacon furnishes the energy and heat. The bacon also makes the dish palatable.
