AN OFFICER IS NEEDED

There is imperative need for I. C. R. and C. P. R. officers at the station when tickets are being sold. There are times when there are numbers in line waiting for their chance at the window. Any day you can see the weak and the timid kept back by the strong and boorish. The other day I saw an elderly woman evidently in poor health, in the line at the C. P. R. window, I saw three men and one aggressive female press in front of her and keep her back. The next day I saw the same thing repeated at the I. C. R. window. Modest people who kept in line were kept back by vulgar people of both sexes, and there were no officers to see that there was fair play. I spoke to the officer at the depot, who told he had seen the necessity for having someone at the ticket office to protect ticket buyers but his work was somewhere else where it was of less importance.

ABODES IN VOLCANIC CLIFFS.

If we draw a line through Tarsus due north across the Peninsula of Asia Minor, and another through Smyrna directly east, the two lines will intersect in the volcanic region of Mount Argæus, where the cone pyramids and pure cliff dwellings of Cappadocia are found.

The whole region is of volcanic formation, which covers a vast area extending west to Selime and south to Soghanli Dere, and is composed of a deep layer of pumice stone, tufa or pebbles overlaid in the region of "Atlar" by rugged lava fields.

The pumice or tufa is of almost incredible thickness, and the overlaid layer of lava is comparatively thin, not more than three feet at any point. The tufa is so soft that it can be dug away with the thumb nail, so that only a few inches of pumice are used to excavate it into chambers of any required size. It is known that a chamber 35 feet long, 12 feet broad, and 10 feet high was excavated by a single workman in the space of thirty days.

STILL VIRTUALLY UNKNOWN.

In this region the troglodytes of Cappadocia have the wonderful dwellings which were first described by Paul Laroux who travelled into Asia Minor on the commission of Louis XIV. His story was discredited, but it is correct in every vital particular, and he perhaps has understood the truth when he estimated the number of cones at fifty thousand. The region was visited in succession by Texier, Hamilton, Tschichatsch, Amansour, Barth, and Mordmann, but it is still virtually unknown.

The height of the cones varies greatly, ranging perhaps from fifty to three hundred feet. The tallest cones usually stand in the centre of an eroded valley, but not always. The process of disintegration by the solvent action of water still continues, of course, and in many cones the exterior wall has been worn away to such an extent that the chambers are laid bare. Such exposed chambers, if they lie fairly to the sun, are used for drying grapes and other fruit, as they are safe against invasion by animals.

Often the cones are almost perfect in shape, and originally all of them were crowned by caps of lava. (As in the picture of the cone forest near Martchan, which were the primal cause of the cone formation. The caps maintain their position because they form one integral conglomerate mass with the cone.)

Very often the doorways are quite elaborate, and display an attempt at architectural and decorative effect, more especially in the case of cones that have been turned into temples, churches or chapels. The usual method of ingress is described in a note below our double-page illustration.

On entering the doorway of any of these cone dwellings, we find ourselves within a spacious chamber, about the walls of which niches and shelves for the storage of the household effects have been cut into stone. The stairways leading to the upper stories are like wells or round chimneys, and one ascends to an upper story by means of ladder holes cut in the rock.

The floors between the stories are usually thick enough to withstand any weight that might be put upon them, but occasionally the excavators miscalculated the thickness of the floor, and so had to make one lofty chamber instead of two. As many as nine stories may occur in one cone, out most have only two, three or four stories, which can be counted by the windows.

DOVECOTES FOR PIGEONS.

Great numbers of the cone dwellings are used today as dovecotes for flocks of pigeons, the eggs and flesh of which are used by the cave-dwellers. The windows of such pigeon houses are all purpose, troglodytes, but if we leave out of consideration the fact that their dwellings are at least partially underground, they differ in habits and customs in no whit from the ordinary Turkish villagers with ordinary humankind surrounding.

POLICE IN REVOLVER DUEL WITH SUSPECTS

One of Quartette Supposed to Have Robbed St. Eustache's Bank, Wounded, But They Got Away

MONTREAL, Sept. 2.—A revolver duel took place today between Montreal detectives and four suspicious characters near St. Constant, who are supposed to be the robbers who broke into the St. Eustache bank. St. Constant is on the south side of the St. Lawrence directly from Caughnawaga, on the Canadian Pacific Railway. St. Eustache, where the bank robbery took place, is on the mainland, about fifteen miles directly north of the Island of Montreal.

When the four men were discovered by Detective Posie, Simon and Brosseau decided to intercept them. They separated and Detective Posie got the closest. Three of the men started off and the detective made a grab for the last one. Just as he did so the man drew a revolver and aimed it full in the face of Posie. The weapon was held so close that Posie was blinded for a few moments, but he managed to use his own revolver and succeeded in wounding the tramp burglar in the arm. He then made off with his pals.

It was first thought that Posie had been shot in the head, but upon closer examination it was seen that his face bore no more dangerous marks than the powder charge, the bullet just missed him.
