The Game of Life and Death

By LINCOLN COLCORD.

"I stood at the head of the table, and they began to play, while the two lines of men down the sides of the cabin crowded closer, emitting little grunts and sharp exclamations of approval. Standing there at the heart of this bizarre, extraordinary scene, I almost doubted that I was still alive. For a long while my thoughts were wandering and inattentive; I tried to retrace the last few hours and place the circumstances together into some semblance of reality; and as I worked my way slowly up to the present situation, I gradually became aware that I was observing a rare and powerful exhibition. . . a battle in the air! Men have paid money to see wonder, to hear music played, to be touched at the very core of their emotions by a perfection of illusion. Well, here was the real thing, free, or maybe bought at the final price which passes us through the most mysterious door. And I was touched. . . believe me! I was thrilled in every nerve. . . uplifted, transported by a wave of emotion, by the fearfulness of the stroke, and by its diabolical cleverness. I saw at last the stake that Lee Fu Chang was playing for."

"They sat with the cards between them, absolutely motionless save for the gestures of their hands. Their faces were a study. I felt as if I were trying to read deep and profound words on a blank page. And yet with all their immobility they did not give me the impression of indifference. Far from it. Behind their thoughtless countenances the imagination was stirred to a surge of emotion. . . in one, watchfulness that didn't show in the eyes, distrust that never crept into the voice, plans and plans, advancing, being analyzed, weighed, approved, by a wave of emotion, by the fearfulness of the stroke, and by its diabolical cleverness. I saw at last the stake that Lee Fu Chang was playing for."

"The Chinaman trembled and turned to his men, speaking in a rapid patter of dialect. An argument seemed going on; they evidently did not understand, but after he had spoken for a time, he thought that I could see their eagerness shining like a light in their eyes. Suddenly an explosion of cries, hoarse, angry, and very, very loud, broke out. The leader of the game, pointing toward the table and the game. He set down like a man in a flash."

"Play!" he said. "Lee Fu Chang dealt, and neither he nor I had opened. On the second deal he opened. On the third deal he opened. On the fourth deal he opened. On the fifth deal he opened.
