As the seas would strike the port bow the spray would be sent clear over the ship and it struck as high as the mast head and froze almost as fast. Pottery Burned Down.

Fire, fanned by a 30-mile wind, de-troyed the Poole Pottery Company's establishment on the Loch Lomond road Friday night, and so complete was the destruction that within less than an hour and a half, all that remained of one of the city's industries was a lofty chimney, a couple of crumbling ovens, a tangle of ruined machinery, and a desolation of blazing the couples.

Fifteen people are thrown out of employ ment, and to the Messrs. Poole there is a loss of something in the vicinity of $7,000 for the building with its stock and equip aging director; Arthur Simpson, George Grosvenor, trustees, No. 120 Lombard street, London, E. C." This letter read as ment, although insured for $8,500, was valued at $16,000.

The pottery, which has been in existence or 22 years, burned with a fiercenes uite in accordance with its tinder-lik good, and the bitter intense wind of las vening. The first 20 minutes the flame eared and waved in scarlet gusts, and avalanches of sparks streamed across the road, and onto roofs of adjacent houses and the pottery conducted by Mr. Foley. the former partner of Mr. Poole.

A striking feature of the fire was the quickness with which it burnt itself out.

An hour from its outbreak there was nothing left but the chimney, and charred walls. The pottery was established by Messrs. Poole & Foley 22 years ago, began in a modest way, and from year to year an occasional improvement or addition was nade.

The manufacturing building was 60x30; the two kilns 50x80. In all the structure with its different buildings was about 120x30. The manufacturing building was two stories high.
