SELECT STORY. At the World's Mercy. BY FLORENCE WARDEN. CHAPTER III--Continued.

So I was playing the last notes of Wollenhaup's Marche Militaire when Elsie came in.

Maynard had met her at the door and prepared her for the sight of our patient. She greeted him more kindly than I had done.

"Your sister will not allow me to be grateful." "Neither will I. I am a weak-minded person, and copy my sister in everything."

"With a laugh at this brilliant exchange of wit, we said good night for the last time, and dropped into silence."

"If he well enough to travel?" asked I. "Scarcely. He will stay a day or two at an hotel in town first, and I shall accompany him to Dover."

"I am not a bit excited, and anxious for our invalid's appearance." "Positively the last appearance," said Elsie, mournfully.

"I won't have another tele-tele with him, Elsie," I had said--so we were together when he came into the sitting-room.

who only lay still and had to be fed and I, who was two years more advanced than Elsie toward the age of terror of "what people will say," felt uneasy.

"I don't wonder about it," she answered, very gravely. "I am quite certain, Gilling, that for the last few days he has been shamming."

"Elsie, do you know what you are saying? If it is true, the man is the most dishonorable creature living!"

"What can be said to excuse himself for having deliberately listened to conversations of the most private nature--that he must have known we would not for the world have held before a stranger."

"Well, as for that, it is about the best thing he could learn, as it justifies our conduct, and shows him what kind of girls we are. Without vanity, I may say that he must have discovered that we are women who deserve respect, and he is the last person who ought to blame us for our rashness."

"I was very noble of her," said Elsie, with courtesy, but without enthusiasm.

"Yes, it was," he answered quietly. "When she went back to her home--she lives in Kent--I determined to go abroad for a little while; I began to feel heavy and stupid, and I thought a change would rouse me."

"I must not think we want to get rid of him before he is fit to travel," said I.

"I am not a bit excited, and anxious for our invalid's appearance." "Positively the last appearance," said Elsie, mournfully.

"Only three murders, two suicides, and a burglary." "Oh, is that all? I did not know how far down the list I might have got. I think I had better confess the rest now I am in my right mind."

"I will begin by saying that my name is Eugene Barach. Perhaps you may have heard that I have distinguished myself by a lamentable failure in an undertaking I had very much at heart."

"I had worked myself into a state of strong excitement, and the collapse was terrible. I went down to hide myself at my father's place in Berkshire. My elder brother was at home, and an elder brother's sympathy, when one has made a fool of oneself, is not of the tender kind."

"I am afraid--I think it would be better--not. I am sure you will not think my--our refusal discourteous, knowing--all about us."

"I have boasted too much already; it is position to say 'I will' in the matter. But I shall try again some day. I hope I am too vain to like the feeling of having failed. And I believe in it, you see; I have spent my time, my brain, my enthusiasm, all I had, upon it--in these circumstances it is natural to try again; wouldn't you?"

"I am not a man; I have none of the qualities useful in the carrying out of a great enterprise. Perhaps, if I had courage and a steadfastness--"

"I have, you are going to say; and I am much obliged to you. But I have nothing but emotional courage and the steadfastness of obstinacy. This is not modesty on my part, but the result of self-study, I assure you. You can scarcely know as well as I do."

conscious, and that, if I spoke, I should lose the voices and the music. You think my conduct incensurable, Miss Verney--you see I know your name, and that you are the elder; but please believe that I was influenced by no wish to pry into your affairs. I don't think, after all, I heard much which you would rather have kept unknown. Although you thought me more deaf than I was, my presence still put a restraint upon you, I think, for, when your talk grew very confidential, your voices got very low, and I gave you my word I didn't listen; and, if I had, I don't think I could have heard. You talked more about art and the book 'Miss Guinevere' is reading, Carlyle's 'French Revolution,' than about anything else, until--until some letter arrived which disturbed you, I believe, said he discreetly. 'And then came your brother's visit, and I felt that it was time for me to go, if I could; so yesterday, as you know, I discovered myself to Maynard and afterward to you. I am afraid you, Miss Guinevere, think I have committed an unpardonable offense. In considering it, please remember what a burden you will make my deep obligation to you if you think I have been guilty of ingratitude and ill-breeding toward you and your sister.'

"We don't think anything of the kind," said Elsie eagerly. "Do you know, for the last few days I have guessed that you were not quite fast asleep, though Guinevere did not. And I think myself that your reasons are good ones; indeed I know some of them before you mentioned them."

and I heard the clock strike two. Then I went noiselessly to bed. I think Elsie was awake; but she did not speak to me.

CHAPTER IV. It was strange what a slight effect that so unusual episode in our quiet lives left upon us. We went on next day with our drawing and writing as if no young man with an interesting history and an embarrassing gratitude had ever occupied much of our time and thoughts. We hardly even spoke of him; I wondered that Elsie did not but I did not suggest the subject myself.

"No. You know it is a company no longer." "Will it ever be?" I asked rather anxiously.

Mrs. J. H. Hornsby, 122 Pacific Ave., Santa Cruz, Cal., writes: "When a girl at school in Reading, Ohio, I had a severe attack of brain fever. On my recovery, I found myself perfectly bald, and, for a long time, I feared I should be permanently so. Friends urged me to use Ayer's Hair Vigor, and, on doing so, my hair began to grow, and I now have as fine a head of hair as one could wish for, being changed, however, from blonde to dark brown."

"After a fit of sickness, my hair came out in combfalls. I used two bottles of Ayer's Hair Vigor and now my hair is over a year long and very full and heavy. I have recommended this preparation to others with like good effect."--Mrs. Sidney Carr, 1400 Regins st., Harrisburg, Pa.
