The Separation.

After I die will the order shift? The sorrow wane and the shadow lift? Every more will the sun come up? A golden ball in a silver cup? And shed its light and its warmth to bless And free your heart of its loneliness?

After I die? After I die will there be no face No hand, no voice, to take my place? None to live in my happy smiles? None of them all who will take your hand? To sympathize and to understand? As once I did—and to comfort you? And strengthen as once I went to do?

After I die? After I die will there be no face No hand, no voice, to take my place? None to live in my happy smiles? None of them all who will take your hand? To sympathize and to understand? As once I did—and to comfort you? And strengthen as once I went to do?

When and rejoiced in the heart she'd dissolved. Now and then the two in the dining-room exchanged remarks, but in general they ate in silence. There never had been need of words between them.

After supper they went out on the porch. Charley, with the evening paper, apparently there was not much news, for he tossed it aside, presently. His father looked for the dandelions but they had closed, so he could only tell him of them. Charley listened, pulling the ball of the yellow kitten.

"You see," he said, "jolly little Charley always liked them," but he spoke so softly and in a moment Naomi had forgotten the words.

"After I die? After I die will there be no face No hand, no voice, to take my place? None to live in my happy smiles? None of them all who will take your hand? To sympathize and to understand? As once I did—and to comfort you? And strengthen as once I went to do?"
