Farm and Household. Keep Farm Accounts.

Farmers generally, those who know them best say, are very neglectful in regard to keeping farm acto keep a strict and intelligible account with his farm, so as to know count with his farm, so as to know certainly whether his business pays or not; or if it does pay, how much National Policy." it pays. Farmers are much in the habit of complaining of small profits. Yet few of them are able to show, order to obtain even a respectable living; the other is, that farmers as a class, although they work hard at some seasons of the year, and have many disagreeable things to attend to, as for instance, milking cows Sunday afternoons, while villagers are walking or riding, yet take the year through, summer and winter, rainy weather and fair weather, the average farmer does not work with that tiresome, never-ceasing industry that follows the factory bell or whistle, or that makes success possible among the so called learned proble among the so called learned professions. If either of these claims are false, a little systematic book keeping will enable one to show it up in his own case at least. It makes no particular difference what form one's accounts are in, the
