Divorced Life

Marian Begins to be Advertised

Marian picked up the newspapers excitedly on the morning after her theatrical debut. One paper devoted five inches to a review of the play, and the other seven. Wiltree's work and his leading woman's was praised lavishly. The first review called Marian's work amateurish. The other called it capable and distinctly promising. Marian consoled herself with the reflection that the paper containing the latter reference to her work was by far the foremost newspaper in the city. She snipped out the two notices with her scissors, and read and re-read the latter with surge after surge of satisfaction.

Roaming idly through the rest of the paper, her attention was suddenly riveted abruptly to one of the columns. Her own picture stared at her from unfamiliar surroundings—flanked on one side by a murder story and on the other by the tale of an army scandal. Her amazed eyes ran down the story beneath her picture. In substance it embodied the self-same string of fabrications she had forbidden Ratgenbauer to print, on the day of her scene with him in his office. She was furious.

At the close of that morning's rehearsal for the following week's play, a play with a small cast in which no part had been assigned to Marian, she located Ratgenbauer in his office at the theatre. He greeted her with bland warmth, and hoped that she liked the flowers he had sent. In her wrath about the newspaper story, Marian had forgotten all about the floral gift.

"They were beautiful, thank you," she said, disconcerted for a moment. "You shouldn't have gone to all that bother."

"Sweetest to the sweet," he smiled. "What did you think of my work last night?" she asked.

Nothing is prettier among the children's hats than the little shady affairs tied with ribbons under the chin.
