CHAPTER XX.

"You shall leave it when you will—to-night even, if you wish it, my darling; it is still early afternoon. I will telegraph for rooms. Pauline shall accompany you; the others can remain, with the exception of my man and follow to-morrow."

"But it is so much trouble," began Margery.

"Trouble, my sweet, where you are concerned! You would like a change? Yes, I see it in your eyes! We will go, and this, Margery, shall be the beginning of our married life, hence forth to be spent hand in hand together. I will go at once and give my orders; we will start by the first train. I believe there is one about half-past four."

"You are so good!" Margery murmured.

He bent, and raised her hands to his lips.

"Never say that again, my darling; my whole life is for you."

As he left, and looked at the sea, Margery turned once more to the window. Yes, she must go.

Suddenly the misery, the weight of her struggle seemed to overcome her. She had sat and dreamed much; she must now put aside all dreams, and turn to life in real earnest. The sea no longer comforted her, and the words her husband had quoted strengthened the desire that had been growing within her to leave it.

"The tender grace of a day that is dead Will never come back to me!"

The truth, the agony in those words, struck her with bitter force. She roused herself with a great effort, determined to fling aside all her weakness and face her duty.

The entrance of Pauline checked her musings.

"Mildred is really going!" exclaimed the maid, delight shining in her great black eyes. "Ah, but I am glad! Mildred will be so much better away from this dismal place; it is enough to give one the migraines. Mildred is wise."

"You are glad to go, Pauline?" questioned Margery, smiling, as she watched the maid bring out a costly mantle and furs for her coming journey.

"No, no, miss, out, mildred! I love London—the sea is so triste. Mildred will take her jewels with her, sans doute!"

"My jewels, Pauline! I have none."

"Made, how simple! Mildred has never been even shown her beautiful seen them flashing on the frail, white hand of the dead girl.

"They are sacred to me—I shall treasure them both," she said, reverently, then turned aside with trembling lips.

Pauline returned in two minutes, and the jewels were restored to their cases and packed in their iron-bound box for the journey.

Margery, wrapped in her furs, took her last look at the sea, its sullen surface already broken by flocks of white. The vast expanse of dull-green water bordered by the gray sky struck her suddenly with a sense of gloom.

She turned from it with a sigh of relief; and, as she left it, determined to banish all the dreams and sad recollections it had brought her, burying all memories in its dark, unfathomable depths.

So she went away from the quiet village back to London and to life, back to duty, firm in her new-born strength and will.

"Ah, they are happy, mildred and mildred, both!" sighed Pauline to her companion and fellow traveller, the earl's valet. "She is so simple and so pretty—and they have love, Ah, monsieur, how great is that wonderful love!"

The husband and wife sat silent during the greater part of the journey. Margery, resting her head against the cushions, sat with closed eyes. The earl thought she slept, but sleep was far from her. A vague longing seized her that she might step back into the far distant past, when she knew neither the greatness of joy nor the bitterness of sorrow. If she could be once more the simple-minded girl, living in all contentment her peaceful village life, her studies the one excitement of her days! she was happier then, before she had learned the mystery of her own heart, before childhood had vanished and woman hood had come in its place.

CHAPTER XXI.

It had been Lord Court's intention to travel with his wife straight down to Court Manor, after resting a day or two in London; but the death of his aunt, Lady Mervale, immediately on their arrival, necessitated his presence in town, as her affairs were left in his hands. Margery at first felt disappointed at the delay, but after a week had passed she grew content. They had a suite of rooms at the Bristol, and, to Pauline's delight, were in the very heart of London. Horses and carriages were brought up for the Countess of Court's use during her brief stay, and the slender, black-robed girl, with sweet, pathetic face, and crown of red-gold hair, provoked universal admiration. The earl had not many near relatives; but such of his connections as were in town paid an early visit to Lady Court, and found their anticipations of dislike turn to wonder at the gracious dignity and sweetness of Margery's presence. She soon learned that her strange, romantic marriage was the one topic of the moment in society, that every one was eager to see the unknown girl who had won the heart of Nugent, Earl of Court, so eligible, yet so disappointing a party. It gave Margery no pleasure to receive and return the visits of the stately ladies who claimed to be her husband's friends; still, she forced herself to do it, as the beginning of her path of duty. Every day, as she drove out, she dreaded to see those two faces whose images she could not banish from her memory; and she would shrink back in the corner of the luxurious carriage as she passed a riding party, forgetful for the minute that her own features were hidden beneath the thick black veil, which, despite all Pauline's protests, she would wear, forgetful, too, of the fact that, were she to meet Vane Charteris and Stuart, they would never associate Margery Daw with the Countess of Court. For no mention of her name before her marriage had crept out. The world knew that the earl had taken his stater's companion for his wife, and there its information ended. Miss Lawson and Dr. Fothergill and his wife were alone in the secret, and with them it was safe.

One afternoon, at the beginning of the second week of their stay in town a trial came to Margery's pride. Lord Court was claimed by the lawyers, and, after a morning spent among her books, Margery prepared for a drive and some visits.

Was so ill couldn't even sweep the floor.

Now, thanks to Carnol, she can work sixteen hours a day without fatigue.

Here's her story—"When a young girl was knocked down by a nerve and was in bed for weeks and weeks, I was locked in my side and head. In later years I always had the same trouble. Five days out of seven I was never well. I underwent an operation and my doctor told me that my bottom ribs were growing up over the other and passed my back to be one mass of inflammation and lameness. He also said that my kidneys were affected. Even sweeping gave me pain. My operation took place in Brazil, South America. After my operation I had a nervous breakdown with insomnia. One time I didn't sleep for three months day or night. My doctor advised me to go home to England for a change. I stayed in England only a short time, but couldn't sleep. I then came to Canada. I have been here two and a half years and have been laid up now and again. I have also been a great sufferer from eczema in the month due to stomach and my food has given me trouble. One night my husband brought home a bottle of Carnol and I still feel it. I can honestly say now that the eczema is gone. Your great tonic, Carnol has been my salvation, for I can now work with anyone. I cook and care for four, five, six, seven, four children and myself, so that's a good proof that I am feeling all right. All my friends are telling me that I am looking well. I can work from five o'clock in the morning till nine and ten at night. My friends here in Timmins say, 'Don't you find it very hard work?' I say, 'Oh, no, I take my Carnol and that helps me.' I find the days all too short, I wake up in the morning fresh, and sleep as sound as a bell. It would take too much of your time to tell you how I have suffered. It was nothing for me to be taken like one day, from my tongue to my feet. I could just feel my heart beating. My husband or anyone near me had to rub me until I could feel life return to my side. This seems to have completely left me. I am thankful to think I have come to Canada to find so valuable a tonic as Carnol." Mrs. J. Drew, P.O. Box 504, Timmins, Ont. 7-24
