Ages and ages ago, geologists tell us, the waters from the upper lakes swept down the yalley to Lake Ontario instead of discharging over the majestic precipice at Ningara. This was some time before the days of "John A." and this first conspiracy has never been directly attributed to him. In more modern times time and circumstances have worked many changes, and every change seemed to have an adverse induence. It was laid out in 1801 and being at the converging points of the roads to Waterloo and Guelph it soon became a place of considerable importance. After the shrewd Frenchman Peter Desjardins dug the canal through the marshes and around Burlington Heights a tree menous trade was done, particularly in stares and bolts, and it became the shipping port for the surrounding towns of Galt, Waterloo, Preston and others. Then commenced the sivalry between its and its youngers ster Hamilton, and Dundas seemed to have the best of ft. The opening of the Grat Western Railway directed commerce into a new channel and Dundas gave up the fight. The iron horse supplanted the canal boat, and tradually the boats and barges disappeared and were seen on the waters no more. It is now hiefly associated in people's minds with the outcast of the town.

Great dissatisfaction as present exists with the express trains do not stop here. It seems that owing to the alleged steepness of the grades engrees trains do not stop here, and passengers have to go to Hamilton to each express frains either east or west. The high price of loading as are of grain in Dundes has had the effect of diverting the grain trade to other places. A proposition has been made lately to do sway it the present G.T.R. station, run everything to Hamilton and work Dundes by a spur line along the canal bank to the centre of the town. By this arrangement they thing the grain trade can be recovered and the people better accommodated generally.
