In June 1988, the Institute for Peace and Security moved its base from the old house on Gilmour Street in Ottawa, which had become almost its symbol, to new quarters in Constitution Square, on Albert Street at Lyon. While less endowed with historical character and associations, they have greatly improved the Institute's services and, given the organization's special functions, represent a wise, long-term investment.

The Institute is now able conveniently to host meetings and conferences, open to outside participants, in its own properly equipped rooms. Its proximity to Parliament Hill has already allowed for the more frequent involvement of MPs, foreign visitors, journalists and officials in meetings with people from the non-governmental, private sector, and academic communities.

The Institute's library now has enough space to make documentation easily available to researchers, students and members of the public. Indeed, the library has room to grow – in accordance with one of the principal functions of the Institute, "to collect and disseminate information."

Briefing visits to the Institute for interested groups can be arranged with reasonable notice. The address is:
