

PUBLIC POLICY: THE KEY TO REJUVENATING CANADIAN URBAN TRANSIT

This manuscript is a product of the Canadian Studies Research Grant Program. The program promotes research in the social sciences, journalism, business, trade, environment, and law with a unique relevance to Canada, or in the context of the bilateral or North American relationship; and the social, cultural, political, and economic issues that impact on these relationships in the 1990s.

Research grants are designed to assist individual American scholars, a group of scholars, and/or scholars working with a cooperating Canadian institution, in writing an article-length manuscript of publishable quality that contributes to the development of Canadian Studies in the United States and reporting their findings in scholarly publications.

According to the terms and conditions of the grant, the rights of the manuscript remain the exclusive property of the researcher. Copies of the manuscript are provided to the Embassy and the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade.

Paper submitted for publication consideration exclusively to the journal Transportation

Note: This paper is also being submitted to the Canadian Embassy's Canadian Studies Research Grant Program as the required article-length final report for the project "New Perspectives for Rejuvenating Canadian Urban Transit," which the author directed from February 15, 1996 to February 15, 1997. The author gratefully acknowledges the financial support from this Canadian Studies grant to update and expand his previous research on urban transport in Canada.
